there is a different mode of interpreting that resolution besides those expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Without disregarding it altogether, I think it is not necessary to stick in the mere letter of that resolution, but we may adhere to the spirit of the resolution and exclude from our deliberations all business of a strictly legislative character, such as refers directly to the passing of laws. But if I understand the resolution now before us, it simply provides for the appointment of a certain committee to make certain inquiries. They may report a bill. It is not necessary that we should pass that bill at the present time, or consider it. It is possible it might be necessary or very proper to pass it, in which case we should be allowed to act upon it. I think such was the promise made by all the Senators here who were the strongest advocates of putting this muzzle on us. I propose, however, to walk strictly according to the rules that have been laid down, as strictly as I possibly can, although I do not want the muzzle pressed too close. I will wear it during the present session becomingly.

There is one thing in reference to it that I wish to refer to, and that was a remark that fell from the Senator from Vermont, that if this resolution were passed it would open up certain other subjects which, as a patriot, the Senator from Missouri would not wish to open up. I confess I did not understand that; nor do I understand any of those subjects which ought not to be opened up at the present session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He said "as a patriot he would wish to open up."

Mr. FOWLER. Then I misunderstood the remark. I understood it, "as a patriot he would not wish to open up;" but I understand now he said "he would wish opened up." I shall vote for the resolution of the House.

Mr. HOWE. I wish simply to say that a fact has just been communicated to me which would lead me to sympathize with the object of the resolution if that object were before us now for consideration; but as I understand the question to be simply one of construction and a question of order, so to speak, and as I conceive this resolution to be excluded by the express terms of the resolution adopted the other day, I must so say upon my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether it is in order to consider the resolution of the House under the rule adopted by the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Drake, Fowler, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, and Wade—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decide that the resolution is not in order, and it goes over under the rule.

MAXIMILIAN'S DECREES IN MEXICO.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is in order, I desire now to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I read by the telegraphic dispatches from Europe that England, France, and Austria have suspended diplomatic relations with Mexico, and have gone into mourning over the death of Maximilian, and that some of them have even suspended their consular and commercial relations with Mexico, and others may follow this example. There seems to be an entire misapprehension as to the state of affairs in Mexico—

Mr. SUMNER. What is the question under consideration?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am going to offer a resolution; I am merely giving—

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather the Senator would be good enough to proceed in order; offer the resolution first, so that it may be understood.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is perfectly aware that the first question is, whether the resolution shall be considered to-day.

Mr. CHANDLER. Precisely; I know that.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish the rule to be followed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to state a very few reasons for presenting the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. The reasons cannot be assigned, the Senator is aware, until the resolution is received.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I will adhere to the strict letter of the rule, then.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will send his resolution to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose strictly the resolution should first be read for information, that the Senate may judge whether it is in order under the late rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read it:

Whereas it is alleged that Maximilian, the so-called emperor of Mexico, did on the 3d day of October, 1865, issue the following decree:

MAXIMILIAN, EMPEROR OF MEXICO.

Having heard our council of ministers and our council of state, we decree:

ARTICLE 1. All persons belonging to armed bands or corps not legally authorized, whether they proclaim or not any political principles, and whatever be the number of those who compose the said bands, their organization, character, and denomination, shall be tried militarily by the courts-martial; and if found guilty, even of the only fact of belonging to the band, they shall be condemned to capital punishment within the twenty-four hours following the sentence.

The "bands" were the regular soldiers of the republic, fighting for the Government of Mexico.

ART. 2. Those who, belonging to the bands mentioned in the previous article, will be captured with arms in their hands, shall be tried by the officer of the force which has captured them, whether it be a general or second lieutenant, or a sergeant; they are to be tried by the officer capturing them—

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the reception of the resolution except in the common form. I must insist on the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, I will adhere to the rule; and I ask the Clerk to read the remainder of the decree recited in the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ART. 2. Those who, belonging to the bands mentioned in the previous article will be captured with arms in their hands, shall be tried by the officer of the force which has captured them, and he shall within a delay never extending over twenty-four hours after the said capture, make a verbal inquest of the offense, hearing the defense of the prisoner. Of this inquest he will draw an act, closing with the sentence, which must be to capital punishment if the accused is found guilty, even if only of the fact of belonging to the band. The officer shall have the sentence executed within the twenty-four hours aforesaid, seeing that the criminal receive spiritual assistance. The sentence having been executed, the officer shall forward the act of inquest to the minister of war.

ART. 3. From the penalty established in the preceding article shall only be exempted those who, having done nothing more than being with the band, will prove that they were made to join it by force, or did not belong to it, but were found accidentally in it.

ART. 4. If, from the inquest mentioned in article two, facts are elicited which induce the officer holding it to believe that the prisoner was made to join the band by force, without having committed any other crime, or that he was found accidentally in it, without belonging to it, the said officer shall abstain from passing sentence, and he shall send the accused, with the respective act of inquest, to the proper court-martial, in order that the trial be proceeded with by the latter, in conformity with article one.

ART. 5. Shall be tried and sentenced conformably with article one of this law: 1st. All those who will voluntarily assist the "guerrilleros" with money or any other means whatever. 2d. Those who will give them advice, information, or counsel. 3d. Those who voluntarily, and knowing that they are "guerrilleros," will put within their reach or sell them arms, horses, ammunition, subsistence, or any articles of war whatever.

ART. 6. Shall also be tried conformably with the said article 1st: 1. Those who will hold with the "guerrilleros" such relations as infer connivance with them. 2. Those who, voluntarily and knowingly will conceal them in their houses or estates. 3. Those who, by word or writing, will spread false or alarming reports by which public order may be disturbed, or will make against it any kind of demonstration whatever. 4. All owners or administrators of rural estates who will not give prompt notice to the nearest authority of the passage of some band through the same estates. Those included in paragraphs one and two of this article shall be punished by imprisonment from six months to two years, or by hard labor from one to three years, according to the gravity of the case. Those who, being included in paragraph two were the ascendants, descendants, spouses, or brothers of the party concealed by them, shall not suffer the penalty aforesaid, but they shall remain subject to the vigilance of the authorities during the time the court-martial will fix. Those included in paragraph three of this article shall be punished by a fine of from twenty-five to one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment from one month to one year, according to the gravity of the offense. Those included in paragraph four of this article shall be punished by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars.

ART. 7. The local authorities of the villages who will not give notice to their immediate superiors of the passage through their villages of armed men will be ministerially punished by the said superiors by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, or by seclusion from three months to two years.

ART. 8. Whatever residents of a village who, having information of the proximity or passage of armed men by the village, will not give notice of it to the authorities shall suffer a fine of from five to five hundred dollars.

ART. 9. All residents of a village threatened by some gang, who are between the ages of eighteen and fifty-five years, and have no physical disability, are obliged to present themselves for the common defense as soon as called, and for failing to do so they shall be punished by a fine of from five to two hundred dollars, or by imprisonment of fifteen days to four months. If the authorities think more proper to punish the village for not having defended itself, they may impose upon it a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, and the said fine shall be paid by all those together, who, being in the category prescribed by this article, did not present themselves for the common defense.

ART. 10. All owners or administrators of rural estates, who, being able to defend themselves, will not prevent the entrance on the said estates of guerrilleros or other malefactors; or, after these have entered, will not give immediate information of it to the nearest military authority; or will receive on the estates the tired or wounded horses of the gangs, without notifying the said authority of the fact, shall be punished for it by a fine of from one hundred to two thousand dollars, according to the importance of the case; and if it is of great gravity, they shall be put in prison and sent to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter conformably with the law. The fine shall be paid to the principal administrator of rents to which the estate belongs. The provision of the first part of this article is applicable to the populations.

ART. 11. Whatever authorities, whether political, military, or municipal, shall abstain from proceeding, in conformity with the provisions of this law, against parties suspected or known to have committed the offenses provided for in said law, will be ministerially punished by a fine of from fifty to one thousand dollars; and if it appear that the fault was of such a nature as to import complicity with the criminal, the said authorities will be submitted by order of the Government to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter and punished according to the gravity of the offense.

ART. 12. Thieves shall be tried and sentenced in conformity with article one of this law, whatever may be the nature and circumstances of the theft.

ART. 13. The sentence of death pronounced for offenses provided for by this law shall be executed within the delays prescribed in it, and it is prohibited that any demands for pardon be gone through. If the sentence is not of death and the criminal is a foreigner, even after its execution the Government may use toward him the faculty it has to expel from the territory of the nation all obnoxious strangers.

ART. 14. Amnesty is granted to all those who may have belonged, and may still belong, to armed bands if they present themselves to the authorities before the 15th of November next, provided they have not committed any other offenses subsequently to the date of the present law. The authorities will receive the arms of those who will present themselves to accept the amnesty.

ART. 15. The Government reserves the faculty to declare when the provisions of this law will cease.

Each one of our ministers is charged with the execution of this law in the part which concerns him, and will give the necessary orders for its strict observance.

Given at the Palace of Mexico on the 3d of October, 1865. MAXIMILIAN.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, charged with the ministry of State,

JOSE F. RAMIREZ.

The Minister of War,

JUAN DIAS PEZA.

The Minister of Improvement,

LUIS ROBLES PEZUELA.

The Minister of the Interior,

JOSE MARIA ESTEVA.

The Minister of Justice,

PEDRO ESCUDERO Y ECHANOVE.

The Minister of Public Instruction and Religious Worship,

MANUEL SILICEO.

The Sub-Secretary of the Treasury,

FRANCISCO DE P. CESAR.

A true copy. Washington, October 25, 1865.

IGNO. MARISCAL, Secretary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then my resolution proceeds:

And whereas it is alleged that, under that inhuman and barbarous decree, issued in violation of the laws of war, the rights of the Mexican people, and of the civilization of the nineteenth century, Major General José M. Ortega, Brigadier General Nicolas Salazar, Colonels Diaz Paracho, Villa Gomez, Perez Milcua, Villands, and more than two thousand other Mexican patriots, officers and men, were inhumanly murdered in cold blood, after having surrendered as prisoners of war, in violation of every law and usage of civilized warfare.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire as to the truth of the above allegations, and report the facts to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

I deem it very important, Mr. President, that the facts in this case should be known.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the consideration of that resolution to-day. Let it lie over.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well. I will say what I have to say to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under the rules, objection being made to its consideration.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution directing the reënrollment of House resolution No. 6, of the Fortieth Congress, in order that the same may be again signed by the Presiding Officers of the Senate and House, and again presented to the President for his approval.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate some resolutions from the House of Representatives that are on the table.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan was read the first time.

Mr. POMEROY. It appears to me that it is a resolution of legislation: it is a joint resolution requiring the signature of the President. I thought so the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose that is the case.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought we ought to pass it before we passed that rule; but the Senate thought otherwise, and I now object to the reference of this joint resolution to any committee under our rule. If it is referred to a committee and they are to consider it, of course they are to consider it in the light of legislation; and it is precisely in character like the resolution, which the Senate have already said they do not consider to be in order. If this was a concurrent resolution or a simple resolution of the Senate, it might not have the character of legislation; but it is a joint resolution, and if we refer it to a committee and direct them to report, it comes precisely under that class of cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no question about that at all.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is no question about it. I object to its being referred to any committee, or being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection is raised under the resolution of the Senate to the disposition of these bills. I do not like to give a construction to that resolution which prevents our consideration of them. I will refer it to the Senate to determine whether action on this matter is in order or not.

Mr. CAMERON. I am sorry there should be any objection to the passage of this resolution. I do not see that there is any legislation in it. It is merely a justly deserved compliment to one of the most meritorious officers of our Army, a man who has, perhaps acted with greater bravery, greater decision, and more promptness than any other man in the Army. This is merely a resolution of thanks for his services. There is no legislation connected with it. This is a compliment to him, passed by the other House, and all we have to do is, without sending it to a committee, just to put the question and say whether this House will agree to it. It will occupy no time. The Senate is a practical body. If it were a question of legislation about which there would be any debate, of course it ought not to be considered, but I cannot see the propriety of a single objection to passing this resolution preventing its consideration.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senate will not think I am objecting to the resolution per se. I am for it. I tried to have the Senate pass it the other day before we passed this resolution; but as we have passed a resolution that we would not consider any legislative business except on one subject, I am now for living up to it or repealing it. I did not like the resolution, but having passed it I object to considering anything that is a violation of it.

Mr. TIPTON. I move that the resolution limiting business excepting on the question of reconstruction be suspended—not knowing whether I am in order or not—in order that these complimentary resolutions may be acted upon and passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I confess I am entirely satisfied with the idea that these resolutions shall be cut off by the resolution that was passed by the Senate. I think it would be exceedingly immature and improper for the Congress of the United States, upon the little testimony they have before them on the subject, to adopt these resolutions. Until within the last two or three years a vote of thanks of the Congress of the United States was regarded as the highest benefaction that could be bestowed upon an American citizen. We have already greatly lowered it in the estimation of the public by adopting resolutions conferring it upon civilians for no distinguished merit; and now it has been proposed by the House of Representatives, and we are asked to pass resolutions here, not, as has heretofore been the case, in regard to Army and Navy officers for distinguished services in the field, not where they have periled their lives in defense of their country and in their efforts to uphold its banner, but for, it is supposed, civil administration. Now, sir, I confess that in the first place I do not know enough about the administration of these men to be able to pronounce such a judgment as I ought to be able to pronounce when I cast a vote in favor of such a proposition. So far as General Sheridan is concerned, we have thanked him for his services in the field. What do we know about his administration at New Orleans, except such information as we get through the newspapers?

Then again, I know no reason why if we vote the thanks of Congress to these officers we shall not do it to the Governors of your Territories and the provinces you have purchased from Russia and are about to organize; and where this example is to end no man can tell. I think myself that the resolution that was adopted two or three days ago in regard to the business of this session is beneficial and happy so far as it operates upon the joint resolutions that have been sent to us by the House.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, whether it is in order to consider the resolution giving thanks to General Sheridan, &c.

Mr. SUMNER. In considering the question of order I should rather not be led off to any reply to the Senator from Iowa on the merits of the proposition. For the present I forbear to say anything of General Sheridan. He can wait. A just and generous country, I believe, will do him justice, even though this Chamber may be tardy. The question is simply one of order, and we are brought back again to the resolution of last Friday. Under that resolution I cannot doubt, if the resolution is interpreted according to the natural import of its language, this resolution of thanks to General Sheridan is excluded. The resolution of thanks is a legislative act. If adopted by the two Houses of Congress it must be signed by the President, and then pass into the statute-book of your country. Of course it is a legislative act; and therefore if you treat the proposition of last Friday with any respect, you must set aside this resolution of thanks. I do not think the resolution of last Friday entitled to respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Is it in order to consider this resolution at this time under the rule?

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Drake, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wade—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, and Williams—22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule. There are three other resolutions of the same character on the table and they will take the same direction, unless it is objected to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn if there is nothing further to do.

Mr. SUMNER. What are those other resolutions? I should like to have them all read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are resolutions of thanks to other officers.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg the Senator from Vermont to withdraw the motion for an adjournment for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will withdraw it to accommodate my friend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The titles of the other resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read them, as follows:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 54) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Daniel E. Sickles;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John Pope; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John M. Schofield.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a resolution which I ask to have adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate adopted 5th July last, limiting the business of the Senate, be, and hereby is, rescinded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator from Vermont withdrew his motion for an adjournment for the purpose of accommodating me, and I suppose that I am entitled to bring the matter before the Senate which I had in my mind when I made the request of him to withdraw his motion, in preference to the resolution now offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let my resolution take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the present consideration by the Senate of a concurrent resolution which has just been received from the House of Representatives, and which I ask the reading of, for information, now, before making the motion that I have to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is considered as going over under the rules until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. If it is objected to. I wish as soon as possible to have what I regard as an odious resolution, an odious rule, and next to an unconstitutional rule, rescinded. I begin to-day my effort, and I shall repeat it every day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] objected to its consideration, and so it goes over.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; he has the right to do so.

REENROLLMENT OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution named by the Senator from Missouri will now be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 8, 1867.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed and directed, and is hereby instructed and directed, to reënroll House joint resolution No. 6 of this Fortieth Congress, that the same may be again signed by the Presiding Officers of the Senate and House, and be again presented to the President for his approval.

Mr. POMEROY and Mr. JOHNSON. What is that resolution?

Mr. DRAKE. I was just going to state what it is, and to state the facts to the Senate, and to ask this body to consider the matter at this time and concur in the House resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on considering this resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. In the month of March there was a joint resolution of the two Houses passed, which is designated in the concurrent resolution now just read to the Senate. It was a resolution to allow bounties to certain troops enlisted in Missouri. It passed both Houses, and the bill was signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, and the Senators and Representatives from Missouri, up to the time that Congress adjourned over to the 3d of July, supposed that that resolution had been presented to the President for his signature. After the adjournment it was found that it had not been. A search was made for it very diligently, and at last it was found, and after the adjournment of the two Houses it was presented to the President by the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of this body. The President doubted whether it was proper for him to act upon the bill at all, it having been presented to him after the adjournment of the two Houses over from March to July. He consulted his Cabinet in reference to it, and finally came to the conclusion that it was not proper for him to act upon the bill under those circumstances, and made a memorandum on the bill to that effect, and sent it to the office of the Secretary of State. Now, the object of this resolution is simply to obviate the difficulty which an accident put in the way of a bill which had passed both Houses becoming a law. It is simply to order the reënrollment of that bill and the re-signing of it by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses. As the two Houses have considered the measure and acted upon it after due consideration, and as their will in reference to the matter has been prevented from fulfillment simply by an accident, I, on behalf of the State of Missouri, beg the Senate to consider favorably the resolution now before the Senate, and to allow that to become a law by this process, the effectuation of which has hitherto been prevented by the accident to which I have referred. I hope there will be no objection to action upon this resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I feel a personal interest in the success of this proposition, as I am to the full extent personally responsible for the failure of the measure. The bill was presented to me duly on its passage by the Senate at the last session, and by me forwarded to the chairman of the House committee, whose duty it was, under the custom of Congress, to present it to the President. The House had adjourned for that day, however, and it was returned to me and placed on my desk, and there overlooked until after the adjournment of the two Houses. Immediately upon the adjournment it was presented to the President; but he decided that he could not sign it as the Congress had adjourned. It has been suggested that this action is unnecessary; that the bill may simply be called up and presented to the President by the committee again. This cannot be the case, for the reason that the President placed an indorsement on it to the effect that it was presented to him out of time, and it is now on file in the office of the Secretary of State. I make this explanation, and simply ask that the Senate will consider the subject and pass upon it in accordance with its former action, as well on account of its intrinsic merits as the relief it will afford me personally from this calamity.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe in former cases of this kind, where bills have failed at the end of a session through some accident or other, and have not received the signature of the President, it has been the uniform practice of Congress to repass them at the next session. They have been introduced anew and have received the assent of Congress when they are to become laws, or about that date. I have some difficulty in my mind with reference to the introduction of a new practice of this kind; that is, virtually giving the assent of Congress to a bill and sending it to the President and obtaining his signature without its going through the ordinary practice of our rules. I think it is open to serious objection, and without further reflection I am not inclined to vote in favor of this measure.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania strikes me with some force. This is either a law or not a law. A bill passed at the former session of Congress and failed to become a law. How can we make it a law by resolution in this way unless it be a joint resolution that goes to the President, and having all the forms of law? I confess that at first blush it seems to me there may be a difficulty about it.

Mr. GRIMES. Let it lie over until tomorrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it had better lie over until we can reflect a little upon it.

Mr. DRAKE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 8, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

SWEARING OF A MEMBER.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand the credentials of Hon. GEORGE M. ADAMS, member-elect from the eighth congressional district of Kentucky, and move that they be received, and that he may be sworn in as a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. This gentleman's name was not included in the resolution referring the credentials of the other members from Kentucky to the Committee of Elections, and he will be sworn in.

Mr. ADAMS presented himself at the Speaker's table and was duly qualified.

CALL OF STATES FOR BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of States and Territories for bills and resolutions for reference.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. POLAND introduced a bill relating to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.

Mr. BALDWIN introduced a joint resolution concerning the deliverance of the republic of Mexico from its foreign enemies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

D. G. FARRAGUT.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill for the relief of flag officer D. G. Farragut and the officers and men who passed Forts St. Philip and Jackson under fire on the morning of the 24th of April, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. JENCKES introduced a bill to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the joint Committee on Retrenchment when appointed, and printed.

POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK.

Mr. BARNES introduced a joint resolution making an appropriation for the building of a post office in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when appointed.

EXECUTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. BROOKS introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. That Governments or people which execute in cold blood prisoners taken in war, to be treated according to the laws of war, have so violated the great principles of national law as well as of Christianity and humanity as to deserve from the United States none of the protection given by our neutrality laws, and that therefore the Committees on Foreign Affairs in the Senate and House of Representatives be requested to report at an early day a bill repealing so much of our neutrality laws as forbids organizations in the United States of emigration or other parties to effect and secure settlements in Mexico.

BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. MILLER also introduced a bill in relation to the appointment of revenue officers; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed, and printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLER also introduced the following joint resolution in relation to the tariff; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed:

Whereas the prosperity of this country depends in a great measure upon adequate protection accorded to our manufacturing, agricultural, and mining interests: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. That it is the duty of Congress to pass with as little delay as possible a judicious tariff, affording adequate protection to the industrial interests of the country.

UNITED STATES COURT IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to remove the terms of the district court and the term of the circuit court now held at Exeter, in the district of New Hampshire, to Manchester, in said district; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ARMY AND NAVY DESERTERS.

Mr. WELKER introduced a bill in relation to deserters from the Army and Navy of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed, and printed.

AMERICAN REGISTERS.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a joint resolution to grant American registers to certain vessels therein named; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS AT WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a joint resolution providing increased compensation for mechanics and laboring men employed at the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department when appointed.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS, ETC.

Mr. SHANKS introduced the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the people of every nation of right have the control of their own Government respectively, and in their sovereign capacity to create, maintain, or exchange its principles and its workings in accordance with their own judgments.

2. Resolved. That this right includes that of quelling insurrections and repelling invasions, with the right to punish treason at home and usurpation from abroad.

3. Resolved. That all people have the right to choose their own officers, and that all orders of nobility, and all assumed right to rule, based on birth or accident, are in opposition to republican government and obnoxious to a free people.

4. Resolved. That we look with anxious hope for the prosperity of all republican Governments, and at this time especially for our sister republic of Mexico; and that we view with pleasure the information of the restoration to power of the Government of her people over the self-styled emperor Maximilian.

5. Resolved. That (waiving all expression of opinion as to any particular acts of the Government of Mexico,) it is the opinion of Congress that the attempt recently made to establish an empire in Mexico on the ruins of a republic would not have been made had not the United States at that time been engaged in a civil war of great magnitude; and that said attempt was part of a gigantic effort to overthrow and destroy the Republic of the United States, in which the slave power of America and its natural ally, the aristocracy of Europe, labored with preconcerted and united interest; and that the overthrow of the usurped power of Maximilian was necessary to the success of republican principles and government in Mexico and elsewhere, and was eminently right and proper.

6. Resolved. That the people of the United States cannot look with unconcern upon an attempt to control the destinies of Mexico by a Power or Powers in antagonism with republican government.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed.

ABDUCTION OF SANTA ANNA.

Mr. WOOD introduced the following joint resolution:

Resolved. That the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House and of Foreign Relations in the Senate be requested to inquire into and report what action should be taken by the Government of the United States in view of the forcible abduction of General Santa Anna from an American vessel by the Mexican forces in June last, and whether existing treaties between the United States and Mexico and the law of nations were not violated in that case in such a manner as (together with other outrages against the rights and property of Americans) to call for immediate and summary action upon the part of this Government.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. JUDD introduced a bill to enforce obedience to the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select Committee on Reconstruction.

MEXICO.

Mr. HARDING. I offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That we hear with unalloyed satisfaction the announcement of the triumph of our republican brethren of Mexico over the enemies of freedom, and we congratulate President Juarez and his noble compatriots upon the overthrow of Maximilian and the minions of the French Emperor, and the utter annihilation of a throne imported in insult to our nation and in defiance of the oft-declared policy of our Government.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC GROUNDS.

Mr. DRIGGS introduced a joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Whereas, many of the beautiful trees on the public grounds north of the Capitol are being cut down:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are hereby instructed to prevent the further destruction of trees and shrubbery around the Capitol.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds when appointed.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. MUGEN introduced a joint resolution on the subject of Mexican affairs; which was read, as follows:

Whereas it has been alleged in the public journals, as well as elsewhere, that certain officers, soldiers, and marines under the command and control of Benito Juarez, President of the republic of Mexico, did recently, in violation of the laws of nations and contrary to the rights and dignity of the Government of the United States, with force and arms, and against the remonstrance of the commander of the steamer Virginia, board said vessel while she was on the high seas, and more than a marine league from the coast of the Mexican republic, and nearly five miles distant from the port of Sisal, and did trample the flag of the United States under their feet, and did take and carry away a certain passenger then and there being, who is known as General Santa Anna, the said vessel being, as is alleged, the property of certain citizens of the United States; and whereas the Government of the United States have been at peace with and friendly to the republic of Mexico, and has never given aid, support, or encouragement to the late usurper Maximilian; now, while it is not the desire or intention of this House to inquire into or look after the status, personal or political, of said passenger so alleged to have been abducted, it is deemed important to know whether our flag has been trampled upon, our Government insulted, and a person under the protection of our flag forcibly taken away; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the Secretary of State of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House, at his earliest convenience, all the facts which have come to the knowledge of the Government touching and concerning the said alleged indignity.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF NATIONAL BANKS, ETC.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill for abolishing national banks, redeeming the bank notes with legal tenders, and making legal-tender notes receivable for duties on imports; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency when appointed, and to be printed.

GUARANTY OF REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. KELLEY introduced a bill to guaranty a republican form of government to the different States of the Union; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the people of any of the States of the Union shall propose to change their organic law by the formation of a new State constitution, and in such constitution any of the people of such State shall be prohibited from exercising the elective franchise on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude, in that case such constitution shall not become the organic law until ratified by the Congress of the United States.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JONAS PRESTON.

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill granting a pension to Jonas Preston, of Philadelphia, a sailor of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

BOUNTIES OF MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. McCLURG. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to be instructed by the Speaker as to what course of legislation should be adopted to revive (if I may be permitted to use that word) an enrolled bill of this the Fortieth Congress. The bill to which I refer is either dead or in a trance; and I wish to know from you, Mr. Speaker, in what way vitality may be restored to it. I will explain in a few words the position of the matter.

A joint resolution placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with other volunteers as to bounties passed this House without opposition on the 18th of March last, and passed the Senate on the 22d of the same month. That bill was enrolled and was signed by the Speaker of this House and the Presiding Officer of the Senate. It was handed in due course to the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the Senate, (Senator Ross,) and by some oversight—certainly not intentionally—it was placed in his desk, and there remained for eight or ten days; so that it did not get into the hands of the President until after we had taken our recess or adjournment. The President construes that adjournment to be such as is alluded to in the Constitution, and upon that ground declares that he cannot give his signature to the bill. He indorsed his reasons upon the bill and filed it in the Department of State, where it now sleeps.

I want to know how that bill can be revived, and call upon the Speaker for his opinion; and in order that he may know very fully the position taken by the President I will send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read the indorsement upon the bill in the office of the Secretary of State. When that has been read I should like to have the views of the Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

The first session of the Fortieth Congress adjourned on the 30th day of March, 1867. This bill, which was passed during that session, was not presented for my approval by Hon. EDMUND G. ROSS, of the Senate of the United States, and a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, until Monday, the 1st day of April, 1867, two days after the adjournment. It is not believed that the approval of any bill after the adjournment of Congress, whether presented before or after such adjournment, is authorized by the Constitution of the United States, that instrument expressly declaring that no bill shall become a law the return of which may have been prevented by the adjournment of Congress. To concede that, under the Constitution, the President, after the adjournment of Congress, may, without limitation in respect to time, exercise the power of approval, and thus determine at his discretion whether or not bills shall become laws, might subject the executive and legislative departments of the Government to influences most pernicious to correct legislation and sound public morals, and, with a single exception, occurring during the prevalence of civil war, would be contrary to the established practice of the Government from its inauguration to the present time. This bill will, therefore, be filed in the office of the Secretary of State without my approval.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri rises to a privileged question, and asks the opinion of the Chair in reference to a case the history of which he has given from his seat. Previous to the recess taken at the first session of the Fortieth Congress, on the 30th day of March last, a bill passed both Houses and was signed by the Presiding Officers of both Houses. It was a bill in reference to the militia of the State of Missouri. By accident it was locked up in the desk of one of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, a member of the Senate, and was not presented to the President for his signature until two days after the two Houses had taken the recess. The President then declined to sign it for the reasons which are indorsed upon the bill and which have just been read for the information of the House.

The Chair supposes this indorsement of the President may be based upon an opinion of the Attorney General, and while he differs with great diffidence, of course, with that high legal officer, still as it presents a point of parliamentary law he may be pardoned for stating that he dissents from the opinion. The opening sentence of that indorsement is this: "The first session of the Fortieth Congress adjourned on the 30th day of March, 1867." If that were true there is no question that the President would not have the power to sign the bill, but the first session of the Fortieth Congress did not adjourn on the 30th day of March, 1867; they took a recess only until the 3d day of July, at which time, if a quorum did not appear in such House, it was provided that that first session should stand adjourned without day. If Congress had adjourned on the 30th of March last, then it could not now be in session unless it had been called together by proclamation of the President. The Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day." By law Congress has enacted that the first session of such Congress hereafter shall begin on the 4th day of March, leaving the provision in regard to the other sessions to remain as it was. If the first session of Congress, therefore, had adjourned on the 30th of March it could not have met, unless at the call of the President, before the first Monday in December next. The question is whether the President has the right according to usage, according to law, and according to the Constitution to sign a bill during this prolonged recess. The Chair is of the opinion that there is no question as to his power to sign a bill during a recess of a session of the two Houses of Congress. This power has been exercised frequently, and as well by the present occupant of the presidential chair as by his predecessors. Congress has been in the usage of taking a recess over the Christmas holidays for ten days or two weeks under that clause of the Constitution which allows the two Houses to take a recess for more than three days by concurrent resolution. During the last holiday recess, from the 20th of December to the 3d of January following, a bill granting land to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon, which had previously passed, was signed by the President on the 26th of December, in the midst of this two weeks' recess, and has been properly published as one of the laws of the United States. If he could sign a bill during a recess of two weeks it seems as if there could be no question that he has the power to sign a bill or to refuse to sign it where a recess may last three, four, or five weeks or months. When Congress adjourns without day it is an entirely different question, and the Chair thinks that the President could not sign a bill presented after that adjournment. But this session has not adjourned; it is the same session which passed the bill, and under the existing state of facts the Chair thinks that the House might direct the reënrollment of the bill, so that it may again be submitted to the President. It is, however, for the House to decide.

Mr. McCLURG. I desire to offer a concurrent resolution for the enrollment of that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make an inquiry of the Speaker. I have no doubt that his view of the parliamentary question raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McCLURG] is correct; but I desire to ask if what the President has written on the joint resolution is not in fact and in law a veto. His discussion of the legal effects of the recess, whether logical or illogical, are his reasons for disproving of that resolution. He signs this statement, which concludes with the statement that he therefore withholds his signature from the bill. Does not that operate as a veto?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill was not returned by the President with his objections.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Chair whether the action of the President does not result in this: that the bill has become a law by reason of not being sent back during ten days?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not decide that question at present. The point now raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McCLURG] proposes a reënrollment of the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. If the bill has become a law can it be reënrolled by the House?

The SPEAKER. Not if the House decides it has become a law. This is the first time the House has had its attention directed to the bill.

Mr. McCLURG. I ask to have the resolution which I offer put upon its passage. It is a concurrent resolution to enroll House resolution No. 6 of the Fortieth Congress placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing as to troops.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed and directed to enroll House resolution No. 6 of this, the Fortieth Congress, that the same may be again signed by the Presiding Officers of the Senate and House, and be again presented to the President for his approval.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will yield for a moment. This is an important question, and I wish to move its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. Is it not in conflict with our resolution in relation to taking up other business?

The SPEAKER. The rules require a bill or joint resolution to be read three times, to be signed by the Presiding Officers, and sent to the President. This is a concurrent resolution, and does not require the signature of the President.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will allow me to move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and let them examine it in all its bearings and report it back to the House if it is deemed proper.

Mr. McCLURG. I cannot yield for that motion. This matter was before the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was embodied by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in a bounty bill, was reported to the House, and was passed. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded—ayes 67, noes 20.

Mr. SPALDING. Is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the Chair whether this bill has been returned.

The SPEAKER. It has not. It has been copied by the gentleman from Missouri from the files in the State Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Then I desire to know how the House can entertain jurisdiction over the question at all.

The SPEAKER. By taking the previous question as it has already done. It is a matter for the House to determine.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to—ayes 71, noes 28.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTION OF MAXIMILIAN AND SANTA ANNA.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to transmit to this House any official correspondence or other information received by the Government relative to the capture and execution of Maximilian and the arrest and reported execution of Santa Anna, in Mexico; and that the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed, if such correspondence should be received during the recess of Congress, to cause the same to be printed for the information of its members.

Mr. ORTH. With the consent of my colleague on the committee, I desire to offer the following amendment to the resolution:

Resolved further, That the President, under like restrictions, communicate to this House all information in possession of the State Department in regard to certain agreements said to have been entered into between the United States, European and West Virginia Land and Mining Company and certain reputed agents of the republic of Mexico in reference to the issuance of certain bonds, the possession of certain mining claims or other matters whatsoever.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of that amendment again. It seems to me that it does not come within the kind of business authorized to be done at this session.

The SPEAKER. It was received by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not hear the consent asked for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated it audibly. Mr. RANDALL. Is that amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes the point, the Chair will rule upon it. The Chair, from the hasty reading of the amendment, thinks that it is in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ORTH's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS' resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is now entitled to the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. ROSS. I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts proceed. I object to his yielding further.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to offer a resolution. I hope the gentleman will hear it read.

Mr. ROSS. I want the gentleman from Massachusetts to go ahead with his business. I do not yield.

KENTUCKY ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I present the answer of John D. Young to the statement of Hon. Samuel McKee, of the ninth district of Kentucky, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOKS. Has the gentleman any objection to its being read and printed in the proceedings of the House, as the protest of Mr. McKee was?

Mr. DAWES. I suppose that all the papers will be printed together.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. McKee's memorial or protest was read in the House when the gentleman from Massachusetts was not here, and what I ask is if the gentleman has any objection that Mr. Young's answer shall be read here also.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to its being read in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the answer of Mr. Young.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the gentleman from New York; but I am informed by gentlemen sitting near me that the notice to which this is an answer was not read in the House. I am not certain about that myself.

Mr. BROOKS. The memorial of Mr. McKee was read, and if this is an answer to that memorial it ought to be read.

Mr. DAWES. This is not a memorial or notice of contest. It is the answer of Mr. Young to the remonstrance of Mr. McKee to Mr. Young's taking his seat in the first instance. Let it be read and referred to the Committee of Elections, and then it will take the same course as Mr. McKee's remonstrance.

Mr. BROOKS. That is all I ask.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Representatives of the Fortieth Congress:

My attention has been called to a most extraordinary paper signed "Samuel McKee" laid on the desks of members, and referred with my credentials to the Committee of Elections.

As that paper is designed to prejudice me in the judgment of members of the House, and may affect my right to a seat, I deem it my duty to answer it.

I am the Representative-elect to this Congress from the ninth district of Kentucky.

It is a district which has been represented throughout the war; it is in a State which did not secede.

My majority in a peaceful, constitutional election, over Samuel McKee, the signer of the paper referred to, was 1479, and was more than 600 over both my competitors—there being three candidates.

My seat has been contested by Samuel McKee for reasons expressed in his notice of contest, and answered in my reply, both of which documents I presume are before the Committee of Elections. The issues there made will be met at the proper time and in the proper manner. It is sufficient at this time for me to say that I shall abide the result with confidence.

The question raised by the paper signed "Samuel McKee," a paper without a precedent in the legislative history of our country, affects my right to sit in Congress pending the contest.

I understand the settled usage in legislative bodies in this country and England to be, that the person holding the certificate of election, which gives a prima facie right to sit, shall be sworn in and act until otherwise decided upon the proofs submitted in the contest.

Holding the prima facie title to the seat, under this rule I ought to be admitted.

The papersigned Samuel McKee is leveled against my right to sit pending the contest.

Because it has been received by the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee of Elections, because it has been printed and laid on the desks of members, and because it may have had some influence upon the minds of members and on the action of the House, I deem it proper to respond to this paper, irregular as it is.

In the first place, I desire to call attention to the fact that said paper nowhere charges that I am not the legally chosen Representative of the ninth district of Kentucky, chosen by a fair and free vote, and by an unquestioned majority.

In the next place, I invite attention to the fact that said paper nowhere pretends that its signer, Samuel McKee, a competing candidate and a contestant for the seat, is entitled to represent said district in Congress.

All the objections urged in said paper against my right to sit in Congress are purely personal. Whether true or false, the questions of fact and of law which may arise upon them are, if proper subjects for examination at all, only rightfully examinable on the trial of the main contest to the seat I claim.

But protesting for the present in behalf of my constituents and of the sovereign State of Kentucky against the right of any power or body to inquire in limine beyond the certificates of election I hold, I will, for the information of members of the House, and to afford them all aid in my power in arriving at a just conclusion in the premises, notice and answer in order the several allegations of fact set forth in the paper signed "Samuel McKee."

The first, second, and third charges against me by said McKee, assigned as "reasons" why I should not be admitted to a seat in the House of Representatives, are based upon allegations that I have been disloyal, that I have given aid and comfort, counsel and encouragement to rebels in arms, and that I have violated my oath as a judicial officer of the State of Kentucky by so doing. To each of these charges, in substance the same, I simply state now in reply, as I authorized a member from New York [Mr. Brooks] to state on the floor of the House, that in form and in substance, in spirit and in intent, they are malicious and false from beginning to end.

So, also, the charges set forth in the fourth, fifth, and sixth specifications, or "reasons," that I advised the recruiting of men to fight against or advocated resistance to the Federal Government; that I joined the rebel army, and was a candidate for colonel of a regiment in said army, or for any other office; that I aided bands of rebel soldiers in capturing Union citizens and soldiers, and that I gave them aid, are equally false, unfounded, and malicious.

It is true, as alleged in the seventh "reason," that in 1861 I voted for John S. Williams to represent his district in the Congress of the United States, and for Dr. Parish to represent his county in the Kentucky Legislature, as I had a constitutional right to do. But it is not true, so far as I know or believe, that either Williams or Parish in that canvass discussed or expressed any opinion as to the right of a State to secede from the Union, and I submit that it is not proper to hold me responsible for their subsequent conduct. I have already denied above the allegation which is here again made, that I went into the rebel army, and I now deny, as is further charged, that I ever fled to Canada to avoid obedience to any order of the United States military authorities in Kentucky.

The only notice I think it proper to take of the eighth and tenth charges is to say that they are wholly and entirely false.

As for the ninth "reason" for excluding me from holding a seat in the House, I deem it necessary only to say that I can conscientiously take the oath required by law for the admission of a member, and that I am ready and willing to do so, and whatever might be my own or the opinions of others as to its constitutionality, I would regard it as obligatory and binding upon me until repealed or set aside by competent authority. The slur upon the Democratic party of Kentucky I consider unworthy of notice, and it could only have proceeded from a heart abounding in malice and uncharitableness.

In reply to the closing paragraph in the paper of Samuel McKee, that he can prove the specifications set forth, if he does it will be by perjured witnesses.

I feel the more fully warranted in thus presenting the facts in my case, as by the action of the House in adopting the resolution of Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, of Illinois, my colleagues and myself are denied our seats pending the "report of the committee," and we are not aware of any standing rule that admits us to the privilege of the floor as members-elect, the rule on that subject being applicable to members of a future Congress, while by the adoption of another resolution contestants from the State of Kentucky are admitted to the floor; thus presenting the singular spectacle of closing the doors to those holding the regular credentials of members and extending privileges denied them to contestants.

Respectfully, JOHN D. YOUNG.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask a question in reference to the last sentence of the paper which has just been read. It seems to be there assumed that these persons claiming seats as members from Kentucky are excluded from the floor, while the contestants are admitted to its privileges. I made the motion on Friday last for the admission of contestants to the privileges of the floor; and it was I supposed understood by everybody at that time that those claiming seats, not as contestants, but as sitting members, were included in that motion. I would like to inquire of the Chair what is the fact in reference to this point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so construed the resolution, and has instructed the Doorkeeper to admit all the gentlemen claiming seats from Kentucky; both those claiming to be sitting members and those appearing as contestants. They are all claimants for seats.

Mr. GARFIELD. My resolution, I think, would fully include them all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood, and has ruled accordingly.

The communication of Mr. John D. Young was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOKS. With the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I desire to present a protest from Hon. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, against his exclusion from his seat in the House.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that Mr. Beck has already presented one protest.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not informed on that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I hold in my hand a protest of Mr. Beck, already presented by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to present this paper and have it referred to the Committee of Elections. It states that Mr. Beck was elected by about eight thousand majority over his competitor; that the canvass was conducted by public discussion held on nearly every day, and that no charges of disloyalty were made against Mr. Beck. I present this protest and move its reference to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I also move that the document be printed.

The SPEAKER. According to the practice heretofore, documents referred to the Committee of Elections have not been ordered by the House to be printed. The committee have authority to order the printing with their report of any documents which they may think should be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says that this protest is similar to one already presented, I will not insist upon the motion for printing.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, under the resolution of the 3d instant, the credentials of certain gentlemen claiming to be Representatives in this House from the State of Kentucky, and also the protest of James B. Beck, A. P. Grover, and Thomas L. Jones, and a motion that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the credentials of Messrs. Grover and Beck, have instructed me to submit a report, which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, under the resolution of the 3d instant, the credentials of certain gentlemen claiming to be Representatives in this House from the State of Kentucky, and also the protest of James B. Beck, A. P. Grover, and Thomas L. Jones, and the motion that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the credentials of Messrs. Grover and Beck report: That as to the credentials of Mr. Grover no evidence has been referred to the committee; but the statement has been made under oath before the committee by Hon. Samuel McKee that the journals of the Legislature of Kentucky for 1860-61 will show that Mr. Grover, as a Senator in that Legislature, voted that Kentucky resist by force the United States in any attempt to coerce the southern States into obedience.

As to the credentials of Mr. Beck there have been referred to the committee an unsworn statement of S. M. Adams, of Lexington, Kentucky, that the said Beck was a member of the meeting in Scott county at which the invasion of the State by rebel forces was agreed upon; that he attended the inauguration of the rebel Governor Hawes, by Bragg, as Governor of Kentucky, and that he announced in the streets of Lexington, during the occupancy of the State by rebels, that he had accepted a position on the staff of John C. Breckenridge.

As to Thomas L. Jones there has been referred to the committee a statement of Hon. Samuel McKee, charging said Jones in general terms with disloyalty, based upon a letter addressed to him by one William S. Rankin, of Covington, Kentucky, of date June 29, 1867, of similar import.

Against J. Proctor Knott there is nothing before the committee except the following statement, made in the House.

"Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, if I understand this question as presented to us now, it is that the credentials of all of the members who present themselves here from the State of Kentucky shall be referred to the Committee of Elections. I believe gentlemen who have been members of this House have protested against the swearing in of certain members of that delegation. I heard on that list as read by the Clerk the name of J. Proctor Knott, who claimed to be elected from the fourth congressional district of Kentucky. Mr. Knott was formerly a citizen of Missouri, a resident of the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. He resided there I believe until 1862 or 1863, when he left that State and moved to Kentucky.

"Mr. Knott, in 1860, I believe, was elected attorney general of the State of Missouri, and served as such until by an ordinance of the State convention he was ousted. In the winter of 1861, February, I believe, the Legislature of that State, which was intensely rebel, as every one knows, called a convention for carrying Missouri out of the Union. Mr. Knott was elected as a member of that convention. He served, commencing the 4th of March of that year. He took an active part in the proceedings of that convention. The question of secession was discussed there, and various measures were brought before that convention for the purpose of accomplishing that result. Now, sir, I state here to-day that the records of that convention will show in all its proceedings that Mr. Knott was allied with those who were the most intense in their disloyalty to this Government, voting for and sustaining all the measures designed to accomplish the secession of the State of Missouri.

"He was attorney general of the State of Missouri. At a subsequent session of the convention all of the State officers were deposed, as you all know, Claib. Jackson being Governor. Mr. Knott went out with the rest. In the session of 1862 he did not appear in his seat in the convention. He was declared vacant, and another was elected in his stead.

"The disloyalty of Mr. Knott in that State is notorious. His status is as well known as that of any other of those who figured in the rebellion. I do not know there is any gentleman here who protests against his being sworn in as a member; but the facts being as I have stated them, I feel it incumbent upon me to rise in my place and object to the qualification of Mr. Knott as the Representative of the fourth congressional district of the State of Kentucky; and notwithstanding there is no contestant, I believe it is the duty of Congress, when the facts are so well known as in this case, that a person who has occupied the position he has, and taken the grounds he has during this war, shall not be permitted to occupy a seat upon this floor.

"I am just informed that the defeated candidate in that district is going to contest the right to the seat. It is a fact I did not before know; but it is necessary the House should know these facts in order to judge of the character of the Representatives sent here from that State to represent her in the Congress of the United States."

In reference to John Young Brown, there is evidence that he published the following letter:

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editor Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South:

"I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks."

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States. What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death, and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully, JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Muhlenberg, ss:

On this 26th day of June, A. D. 1867, before me, a justice of the peace in and for the county and State above named, personally appeared M. J. Roark, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, on his oath doth say that he is a resident of Greenville, county and State above named; and further, that he was present at Morgantown, State of Kentucky, on the 10th day of April, 1867, and heard John Young Brown, in a public speech, declare and avow that he was the author of a letter charged to have been written by him, a copy of which letter is herewith filed, marked B, and made part of this affidavit.

M. J. ROARK.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, by M. J. Roark, this 26th day of June, 1867.

E. G. NEEL,

Justice of the Peace, Muhlenberg county.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Muhlenberg, ss:

On this 26th day of June, A. D. 1867, before me, a justice of the peace in and for the county and State above named, personally appeared E. G. Neel, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, doth on his oath say that he is a resident of Greenville, State of Kentucky; and further, that he was present at Greenville, State aforesaid, on the 8th day of April, 1867, and heard John Young Brown, then a candidate for Congress in this second congressional district, in a public speech, declare and avow that he was the author and responsible for a letter charged to have been written by him in 1861, which letter is filed herewith as part of this affidavit, and marked B. He also stated that in same public speech he had said nothing in said letter that he was not prepared to defend on that day—i. e., 8th day of April, 1867. He further admitted in same speech that for something said or done by him (Brown) he was in the year 1865 arrested by order of Colonel Sam. Johnson, of Seventeenth Kentucky volunteer cavalry, and confined in jail or prison.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, by E. G. Neel, this 26th day of June, 1867.

JOHN M. WILLIAMS,

Justice of the Peace.

In reference to L. S. Trimble there is, among other things referred to the committee, the affidavit of one W. F. Ellistoot that the said Trimble was a partner of his during the summer and fall of 1861 in the business of forwarding supplies through the Federal lines to the Confederate troops.

Against John D. Young there is, among other things, an affidavit of one Willis Hockaday, alleging that in the fall of 1861 he was himself captured and carried a prisoner into the rebel lines by a band of rebels under the command of said Young.

Under the resolutions referring these credentials the committee are not instructed or authorized to send for persons and papers or otherwise authorized to take testimony, but simply to report at as early a day as practicable.

The committee, therefore, report the foregoing facts to the House and await further instructions.

The committee are of opinion that no person who has been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or who has given aid and comfort to its enemies during the late rebellion, ought to be permitted to be sworn as a member of this House, and that any specific and apparently well-grounded charge of personal disloyalty made against a person claiming a seat as a member of this House ought to be investigated and reported upon before such person is permitted to take the seat; but all charges touching the disloyalty of a constituency in a State in which loyal civil government was not overthrown during the late rebellion, or the illegality of an election, are matters which pertain to a contest in the ordinary way, and should not prevent a person holding a regular certificate from taking his seat.

Mr. DAWES. In connection with that report, I ask that the resolution referring the subject to the committee may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that in the elections recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; and whereas it is alleged that several of the Representatives-elect from that State are disloyal: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the credentials of L. S. Trimble, John Young Brown, John Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young, members-elect from the State of Kentucky, shall be referred to the Committee of Elections for report at as early a day as practicable. Pending the report of said committee none of said members-elect shall be allowed to take the oath of office and admitted to seats as such.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the report of the committee be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the report of the committee, I offer the following resolution to the House for adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire and report whether Lawrence S. Trimble, John Young Brown, J. Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young, seven of the persons who claim to have been elected Representatives from the State of Kentucky in the Fortieth Congress of the United States, or either of them, are disqualified from sitting as members of this House on account of their having been guilty of acts of disloyalty to the Government of the United States, or having given aid and comfort to its enemies; and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to hold sessions of the committee during the recess of Congress, if it shall be necessary, for the purpose of a full investigation of that question, and that they report the facts in relation to each of the above-named claimants to this House as early as practicable.

Mr. LOGAN demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSE FROM COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware has requested the Chair to lay the following letter before the House:

The Clerk read as follows:

DOVER, July 4, 1867.

SIR: I respectfully request that you ask the House to excuse me from further service on the Committee of Elections. My intercourse and association with the rest of the committee have been of the most agreeable kind; but I am convinced that the minority can be better served by the appointment of some other member.

Yours, very respectfully

JOHN A. NICHOLSON.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAWES. I am exceedingly sorry that the gentleman from Delaware has seen proper to send such a communication to this House. His relations with the committee have been of the kindest character. The esteem in which he and the services he has rendered is held by the committee is such that, without there are reasons which ought to control our action, I hope the House will decline to excuse him. What his reasons are I do not know. I only express the opinion of the committee when I regret that he has asked to be excused. I hope he may be induced to withdraw his request; and to that end I move that the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

REVENUE FROM TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. KELLEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the amount of revenue that has been received from the tax on distilled spirits from each congressional district in the several States, District of Columbia, each of the Territories, and each of the collection districts of the rebel States during the fiscal year which terminated on the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I suggest that the gentleman make it each "collection district" instead of "congressional district."

Mr. KELLEY. I agree to that modification. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

PUBLICATION OF CABINET ACTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas there was published on the 21st day of June last in the National Intelligencer, a newspaper printed in the city of Washington, what was styled "an authorized statement of proceedings" of the President of the United States and the Cabinet in relation to an interpretation of the acts of Congress "commonly known as the reconstruction acts," which provide for a reestablishment of civil government in the rebel States, said publication purporting to be "by authority;" Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House whether said publication was made by his authority or with his knowledge or assent, and whether the full and complete record or minute of all the proceedings, conclusions, and determinations of the President and Cabinet relating to said acts of Congress and their interpretation is embraced or given in said publication; and that he be respectfully requested to furnish to this House a true copy of the full and complete record or minute of such proceedings, conclusions, and determinations in regard to the interpretation of the said reconstruction acts.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROSS. It is a resolution calling for executive information, which requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That rule can be suspended at any time during the first session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. BOYER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 26, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Culom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glessbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Trump, and Wood—26.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Broomall, Calk, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Dodge, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Morrill, Newcomb, Nicholson, Phelps, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Robinson, Van Auker, Van Wyck, Windom, and Woodbridge—39.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEADS FOR FREEDMEN.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to facilitate the occupation of public lands by freedmen under the homestead act; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands when appointed, and printed.

ASSASSINATION CONSPIRACY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to offer the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas no investigation of all the facts and circumstances connected with the assassination of the lamented President of the United States has been had by competent authority, tending to show who were the persons engaged in the conspiracy to do the act, its inducement, its objects, its instruments, and the means of its accomplishment; and whereas such investigation cannot be fully had in a court of justice trying one or more conspirators on a single issue trammeled with questions of admissibility of evidence confined to that issue: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a special committee of five members of the House be appointed to make such investigation, and to record the facts thereby obtained, and report the same to the House at any time, with such recommendations as may seem proper.

Be it further resolved, That such committee, for the purposes of this investigation, shall have power to send for persons and papers, to appoint a clerk and stenographer, and to sit during any recess of the House; and that the expenses of the investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Be it further resolved, That as the crime to be investigated is of the most heinous, and in this country unprecedented character, and is believed to have included in its plan and perpetration many persons holding high positions of power and authority, because of the civil war, who were acting through inferior persons as their tools and instruments; and as such persons may be prevented from giving evidence, because of liability to punishment for participation in such conspiracy; therefore in order to open all sources of evidence, the committee be empowered to report an act of grace and amnesty according to parliamentary usage to any person having cognizance of such conspiracy not already put on trial and legally convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction of complicity therein, who shall give material and truthful evidence tending to bring to light the facts of said conspiracy; and that in the judgment of the House, no person in whose favor such report shall be made ought to be brought to trial, or any evidence given by him to the committee used against such person on any trial.

Mr. BOYER. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. They are not yet before the House.

Mr. ROSS. We have a great many committees running in vacation, and I should dislike to increase them much.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER. I demand the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 27, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Culom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glessbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Marshall, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Trump, and Wood—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Blaine, Blair, Broomall, Calk, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Covode, Eggleston, Ela, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, McCullough, Morrill, Nicholson, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Scofield, Smith, Taylor, Van Auker, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, Windom, and Woodbridge—43.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think if this resolution is to be passed by the House it ought to include a direction that the testimony taken by the Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and which has been taken by that committee since, should be laid before this select committee. I will state that the Committee on the Judiciary, by the instruction of the House, investigated partially the subject of the assassination conspiracy, and a large mass of testimony was taken. I have been persuaded, and so have a number of the members of that committee, that that testimony should be at some time made public. The committee reported at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, but they continued the examination during the second session, when another report was made upon a certain branch of the case. But the investigation never was considered as completed by that committee, and I think that it should be completed by some committee. There are mysteries connected with it that I think should be ferreted out, and I hope that whatever committee will be charged with this investigation will give it a careful and exclusive consideration until the whole investigation shall have been made complete. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he add to his resolution that the testimony taken before the Committee on the Judiciary shall be laid before this committee as a part of the testimony upon which they shall act.

Mr. BUTLER. I cheerfully accept the suggestion of my friend from Iowa, and I will offer this additional resolution:

Be it further resolved, That all the testimony taken by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses germane to the subject be referred to this committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire further to state that the testimony taken by the Judiciary Committee during the Fortieth Congress has been taken in connection with another investigation, and I, speaking for myself as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, feel that the subject of the assassination will be sufficient to occupy the attention of one committee; and I do not believe that the Committee on the Judiciary, with the great amount of other labor imposed upon it, can give that attention to this subject which is demanded in order that the whole case may be known and placed upon record.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask that the resolutions, as modified, be put upon their passage.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask that the resolutions be reported.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts. For one, I have no objection to the fullest possible investigation and publication of everything connected with the assassination, provided it is done fully, fairly, and justly, and I desire now to suggest to the gentleman that he make this committee of investigation a joint committee of the Senate and the House.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to vote for this preamble and resolutions, if I understand them, and to that end I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the second "whereas," the second recital would not be a declaration by this Congress that the tribunal that has already tried the conspirators was an illegal tribunal?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly not. The second "whereas" only provides that in case any person has been legally and duly convicted by any tribunal, in such case no grace or amnesty shall be offered by Congress or by the committee, because that would seem to be trenching upon the pardoning power; but, sir, as is well known, up to this time no one of the many conspirators in this great conspiracy, however humble, has made the slightest disclosure, and for the reason apparently that there has been no person anywhere to say to them, "If you will tell the truth and it turns out that you are comparatively an innocent party, moved by other higher parties, you shall be saved," which is the usual way of ascertaining the truth in all such cases; and therefore, in drawing these resolutions, I have put in that power which has been sometimes exercised in the English Parliament in like cases, and which I believe is well known to the parliamentary law, that where a man has not been convicted—if he has been and he is an attainted felon, it is too dangerous to take his testimony—but that where a man has not been convicted we may say to him, "If you will come forward and tell the truth you shall have grace and amnesty, and the testimony you give shall not be used against you so far as the judgment of the House is concerned." That, it seems to me, is a necessary power.

One word further, though I did not intend to go into any discussion of this subject. If the resolution does not commend itself to the consciences and judgments of members, nothing that I can say will add to its force. I say here is the greatest conspiracy ever known to a government, breaking upon this country in a manner not paralleled in history; and of that conspiracy of those who had part in it, of its objects, its instruments, its inducements, no record has yet been made, because there has been no investigation by any competent authority. In the investigation before the military commission—of which I do not wish to say one word, except that that commission was necessarily confined to a single issue—the question as to the grand objects of the conspiracy and the various persons engaged in it could not well be tried. Nor was that tribunal, from its nature, fitted for that investigation. On the trial that is now going on, that investigation cannot take place, because at every step both the Government and the defense are trammelled by the rule of evidence that the testimony must be germane and material to the given issue, outside of which neither party can go. But in an investigation under the charge of a committee, who shall deal with the matter carefully and judiciously, with the eye of the country upon them, acting upon their responsibilities as members of this House, reporting to the House and accountable to it, a record may be made of all the facts and circumstances, as a warning to the future and as a memento of the past, which shall be valuable as a part of the history of the country, even if it should discover no other or different criminals from those who have justly suffered the penalty of their crimes; and it may disclose others who should be brought before the tribunals of the country. Why, sir, it has come out only the day before yesterday, in the course of the investigation before the court sitting in this city, that a certain member of the cabinet of the late confederate States furnished money for the purpose of carrying on this conspiracy. That fact has just this moment come out, and come out incidentally. Now, it is for the purpose of dealing with all these facts that we desire this committee, and that the country desires it. Let us have it understood, before assassination becomes established as the customary method of disposing of rulers in this country, as it has in some others, that no such thing can be done without full and thorough investigation.

With your leave, sir, I will now move the previous question.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the honorable gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will do so.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I will go with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as far as he who goes the farthest, to investigate this great crime; and if I should raise a question as to the resolution, pending I have no fear that the public or any portion of the public will doubt my motives when it is known what were my relations with the victim of this assassination. I desire as much as does the gentleman from Massachusetts that there may be a full investigation that shall bring to the knowledge of the public evidence implicating every person really connected with the commission of this great crime. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, by any vote here upon a preamble, to declare formally that the tribunal that was created by the Government and that convicted a portion of these conspirators, was an illegal tribunal. I do not believe that I am called upon to make such a declaration by any vote upon this floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the resolution be again read.

Mr. JUDD. I had intended to ask for the reading of it. I want the gentleman to understand that I will go with him or any other earnest man to probe this matter to the bottom; but I will not vote for the adoption of language which even by implication charges that the tribunal that tried a portion of these conspirators was not legally constituted. Let that question be left to the courts.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman will find, by the reading of the resolution, that he is wholly mistaken as to its purport.

Mr. JUDD and several others. Let it be read.

The preamble and resolution were again read, together with the proposed amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. It seems to me that the effect of this amendment will be to take from the Committee on the Judiciary the testimony which they have taken. The amendment proposes that the testimony which has been taken before the Judiciary Committee shall be referred to another committee of the House. The effect must be to take that testimony from the Judiciary Committee for the purpose for which it was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be the effect. The House can determine, if it sees fit, to transfer from one committee to another.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify his resolution so that it shall provide that only copies of the testimony taken before the Judiciary Committee, appertaining to this subject, shall be referred.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to inquire, in regard to the construction of the resolution, whether it does not give power to the committee to pardon Jefferson Davis and other leading rebels. I would not like to give any such power to any committee of this House.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he believes the efficiency of his resolution would be destroyed by striking out the preamble?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no belief that the preamble gives any efficiency to it, but as it is customary and a rule of the House to vote on these matters without debate, in the first place I put in the preamble as a sort of "stump speech." It having fulfilled its office, I have no objection to its being stricken out, as it does no good and no harm.

As to the fear expressed by the gentleman, that this committee will be empowered to pardon Jefferson Davis, I doubt whether any committee of this House would pardon or bail Jefferson Davis, judging by the vote of the majority of the committees as constituted by the Speaker.

Mr. DAWES. I want to call the attention of my colleague to the last resolution, and to inquire whether it will admit of the construction that those who may have been engaged in the assassination, on their making a disclosure, shall not be punished? I shall ask that the last resolution shall be read, for it seems to me that any person who under it makes any disclosure, that any person in favor of whom that committee shall make a report will go unpunished, never mind how guilty he may be. If it does admit of such a construction, if it has that fault, I for one am not willing, however much confidence I have in my learned colleague, or in any committee appointed by this House, to pledge the country in advance that any person who shall make disclosures shall not be punished, however guilty he may be.

Mr. BUTLER. If the House will pardon me a moment, I think my colleague will find that it is all right. The first clause gives the committee power to report an amnesty act whenever they think proper, and that leaves the House to deal with that subject and that report as they please.

Now, the second part is, that where a party comes forward and makes disclosures, in that case the disclosures which he may make shall not be used against him. That is all; that they shall never be used against him. I understand it to be the usage at common law where a promise has been given that if a man comes forward and makes disclosures he shall not have those disclosures held as evidence against himself. The courts would rule it out. But this being a somewhat novel proceeding, I desire men should come forward and feel that they could not be harmed by what they say before that committee. That is but just and right, and clearly within the power of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the last paragraph of the last resolution be read.

Mr. BUTLER. Read the whole of the last resolution.

The Clerk read the last resolution, as follows:

Be it further resolved, That as the crime to be investigated is of the most heinous, and in this country unprecedented character, and is believed to have included in its plan and perpetration many persons holding high positions of power and authority, because of the civil war, who were acting through inferior persons as their tools and instruments; and as such persons may be prevented from giving evidence because of liability to punishment for participation in such conspiracy; therefore, in order to open all sources of evidence, the committee be empowered to report an act of grace and amnesty according to parliamentary usage to any person having cognizance of such conspiracy not already put on trial and legally convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction of complicity therein, who shall give material and truthful evidence tending to bring to light the facts of said conspiracy; and that in the judgment of the House no person in whose favor such report shall be made ought to be brought to trial, or any evidence given by him to the committee used against such person on any trial.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the power to send for persons and papers I notice there is not included power to administer oaths. As this is a select committee I think that power ought to be included. I suggest that the gentleman add that.

In the second place he says that the committee is empowered to report an act of amnesty. It should be a bill. It does not become an act until it has passed both Houses.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree to those modifications.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In regard to the resolution which has been read, it provides that persons not tried by a court of competent jurisdiction and legally convicted shall be entitled to amnesty on making disclosures to that committee. I propose to modify it so that it will provide persons who have not been convicted, because I see that on the language of the resolution the question rises to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Illinois; and I do not wish the House to pass a resolution which by implication shall question the authority of the commission which tried the conspirators. I therefore suggest to strike out so much as relates to the jurisdiction of the court, and let it stand, persons who have been convicted.

Mr. BUTLER. I admit the modification, and am content to have the words "legally" and "by a court of competent jurisdiction" stricken out to meet any scruples that any gentlemen may have who suppose the language may cast some doubt upon the legal commission, about which, however, I never had any doubt. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana before moving the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I shall detain the House but a moment. The point I desire to make is this: that the Congress of the United States, nor either branch of it, has any pardoning power. That power is vested by the Constitution in the Executive, and by implication, therefore, is denied to all other branches of the Government. Any act, therefore, of this House extending or promising amnesty to any person for offenses against the laws of the United States would be nugatory and void, and to pretend that we have the power thus to pledge the faith of the Government might embarrass and might even dishonor the Government, because no action which Congress can take can circumscribe the power vested in the judiciary in this matter of punishing offenses. Therefore, if for no other reason, I should vote against the resolution, because of the entire want of power in this House or in the Congress of the United States to interfere with the question of amnesty and pardon. It does not belong to the legislative branch of the Government at all. The power of the Parliament of Great-Britain has been claimed as a precedent, but I submit that it is no precedent, because the English Parliament is omnipotent, whereas the power of Congress is circumscribed by the Constitution of the United States, as is that of any other department of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I now move the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to amend by moving a joint committee.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been moved.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to decline to allow me to make the motion?

Mr. BUTLER. I must stand by the original proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will call for a division of the resolutions at the proper time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the previous question is not seconded will it then be in order to move to make it a joint committee?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I hope the previous question will not be seconded. By having a joint committee the public faith of the Government will be more strongly pledged and more relied upon by those who may come forward and make voluntary statements in regard to the conspiracy.

The SPEAKER. This could not be changed into a joint resolution under the rule adopted by the House, but it might be made a concurrent resolution by adding the words "the Senate concurring."

Mr. INGERSOLL. That would have the same effect.

The SPEAKER. It would have the same effect. If there is no objection the modification accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts will be incorporated in the resolution.

No objection was made, and the modification was made.

The previous question was seconded—yeas 91, noes 24—and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for a separate vote on the last resolution which gives the power to report "a bill granting grace and amnesty," doubting, as I do, whether any such power exists in this House, and also doubting the propriety of such proceedings, even though the House had such power.

The vote was then taken on the other resolutions in gross, and they were adopted.

The question recurring on the last resolution in relation to granting amnesty,

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 28, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Meeker, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwaladar C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Noel, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Upson, Van Trump, and Wood—28.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Blaine, Blair, Broomall, Cake, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chpster D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Malloy, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Morrell, Nicholson, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Smith, Van Aukon, Van Wyck, and Woodbridge—40.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PHELPS stated that upon this and preceding votes he was paired with Mr. LAFLIN.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the special Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto passed on the 23d day of March, 1867; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in detail, and is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is hereby declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act of the 2d day of March, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and of the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, in the year 1867, that the governments then existing in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were illegal and void; and that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the authority of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said acts to which this is a supplement shall be construed to authorize the officer assigned to the command of any military district under said acts, whenever he shall deem it necessary to the due performance of his duties under said acts, to remove or suspend from office any municipal or State officer or person exercising authority under or by virtue of any so-called

State government existing in his district, and the said officer so assigned to command as aforesaid is hereby empowered to appoint another person in the stead of the officer or person so removed if he shall deem proper so to do, and whenever he may deem it necessary, as aforesaid to prohibit, suspend, or set aside any act or proceeding of any such State or municipal government, or any act or thing done under or by virtue of its authority; and all acts heretofore done by any such officer in accordance herewith shall be deemed valid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the boards of registration of the several military districts established by the acts to which this is supplementary, shall admit to registration only such persons as they deem entitled to be registered by the acts aforesaid. They shall not regard the taking of the oath prescribed in the act of March 23, 1867, conclusive evidence of the right of the person taking it to be registered, but prima facie only, and may receive such evidence under oath relating thereto as they may deem proper, either from the person applying to be registered or others, and either of the members of said boards is hereby authorized to administer oaths or affirmations and examine witnesses touching the right of any person to be registered. Said boards of registration may strike from the list of voters the name of any one already registered who in their judgment improperly took the oath prescribed in the acts to which this is supplementary, or was not entitled by said acts to be registered. Record evidence shall not be required by said boards to prove participation in the rebellion, but parole evidence shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such participation; and said boards of registration shall not be bound or governed in their action by any opinion of any officer of the United States Government.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no civil court of the United States or of any State shall have jurisdiction of any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, against any such district commander, or any officer or person acting by his authority for or on account of the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this act or the acts to which it is supplementary.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no district commander shall be relieved from the command assigned to him under the aforesaid acts unless the Senate shall have first advised and consented thereto, or unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered or dismissed from the Army; or unless he shall consent to be so relieved.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the time for the completion of the registration of persons properly qualified to vote may be extended by orders of the said several district commanders to any day prior to the 1st day of October, A. D. 1867.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I wish before the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes his remarks that he would allow me to offer some amendments to the bill for the purpose of having them printed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to giving way for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to have his amendments printed, but not offered at the present time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire also to offer an amendment to be printed at the same time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa to offer his amendment to be printed at the same time.

No objection being made, the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to have my amendments reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to have the proposed amendments reported?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Well, sir, I did not intend to yield for any such purpose, but if it will be any accommodation to the gentleman from Ohio I will yield.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask, then, to have my amendments reported.

The proposed amendments of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, were reported as follows:

Amend section two by striking out all after the word "district" in line eight down to and including the words "so to do" in line eleven, as follows: "and the said officer so assigned to command as aforesaid is hereby empowered to appoint another person in the stead of the officer or person so removed if he shall deem proper so to do;" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and he shall, by a public order, invite the electors duly enrolled under this act and the acts to which this is an amendment to elect any officer so removed where the office is elective by the local law in any State, district, county, parish, or city; and until the election and qualification of any person to an office made vacant by removal of the general commanding, said general may detail any person in his command to discharge temporarily the duties of said office."

Add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commanding general of each district shall cause all persons now discharging the duties of any office under the temporary provisional State governments in the several districts named in the acts to which this is an amendment to take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office," which oath when subscribed shall be filed in the office of the general commanding, and if any person discharging the duties of any office under any of said provisional State governments, either by virtue of an election or appointment shall neglect or refuse to take and subscribe said oath within fifteen days after being notified by published order of the general commanding, it shall be the duty of said commanding general to declare such office vacant, and fill the same by the appointment of a loyal citizen, who shall first take and subscribe said oath.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now ask that my amendment be read.

Insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall prevent, or attempt to prevent, the execution of this act, or either of the acts to which this act is supplementary, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BURE. I desire to have read an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will yield to have it read on the same terms.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section two the following:

And such military commander shall immediately after any such removal or suspension from office report the same, with the reasons therefor, to the President of the United States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the following amendment may also be printed:

Add at the end of section three the following:

Provided, That the right of any person to be registered as a legal voter shall in no respect be changed or affected by virtue of any pardon granted to such person by the President of the United States for participation in the rebellion.

Mr. RAUM. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire that the following amendment may also be printed:

Strike out in section three after the word "registered" in line fourteen, the following:

Said boards of registration may strike from the list of voters the name of any one already registered who, in their judgment, improperly took the oath prescribed in the acts to which this is supplementary, or was not entitled by said acts to be registered.

Also, add at the end of the section the following:

Fifteen days before any election held under the provisions of the act of which this act is a supplement, said board of registration shall meet for the purpose of correcting the list of voters. Each board of registration shall have power to add to the list of voters the name of any legal voter who shall take the required oath and prove to the satisfaction of the proper board of registration that such person offering to register his name is qualified to vote under this act and the acts of which this is a supplement. And said boards of registration shall have power to strike from the list of voters the name of any one already registered, upon satisfactory proof that such person improperly took the oath prescribed in the acts to which this act is a supplement, or was not entitled by said acts to be registered. And said boards of registration shall complete the correction of the lists of voters at least five days before the day of election.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether any person really desires to discuss this bill. It has been printed, and is, I suppose, pretty generally understood. I do not think there is any real desire to criticize or discuss it to any great extent. I am willing to allow the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] to be considered as binding; and I trust it will not be considered harsh for me now to demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to deprive the minority in this House of all opportunity to discuss this bill. I trust he will give us some chance to enter our protest and to present to the House and to the country our reasons for voting against the measure, as we most assuredly shall do.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania would allow me to make a suggestion. This is the third bill which has been introduced to this House upon the subject of reconstruction within the last few months. The necessity for the passage of this bill, if such necessity exists, arises unquestionably from the fact that no proper discussion was allowed upon the last bill which was passed on this subject. It is now avowed, not only in this Capitol, but throughout the entire country, that that bill was not understood. The differences of opinion which have arisen upon the construction of that bill have, in my judgment, resulted from the fact that no proper discussion upon it was allowed. Measures abolishing the Constitution, doing away with all civil power within ten States of this Union, are rushed through under the previous question; and session after session of Congress is called in order to correct the errors resulting from this course of procedure. I trust that such is not to be the course with this bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. When will the gentleman be done with his suggestion? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman allow me to move an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will hear it.

Mr. BOYER. I propose to amend the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order, as the title is not now before the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I propose, if the previous question be sustained, to give three quarters of my hour for discussion to the opposition. Then when they have spoken perhaps I will say a word and ask for the vote on the subject. That is about as far as I can go. I will hear from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD. Permit me here and now in the most friendly spirit to suggest to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that had there been more time permitted in the discussion of the preceding measures in this House, to correct their careless phraseology and to put them in proper language, so that they should not be susceptible of the construction which has been put upon them, we would not in all probability have been compelled to sit here during the dog-days to do what we ought to have done before, and what some insist we did before.

Now, I do not know what gentlemen on our side desire to discuss this measure, but I wish only for a few minutes myself. I suggest whether it is fair, whether it is liberal, whether it is magnanimous in the gentleman to limit the House to any time in discussing a measure of this magnitude and importance. I do not know whether three quarters of an hour will be enough, but I suggest to him to allow us a fair indulgence, so that we may present to our constituency—for it will have no influence on the vote in the House—and to the country the grounds on which we shall vote against it.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to submit a minority report if gentlemen will allow me time to prepare it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not understand the gentleman to ask to make any minority report.

Mr. BROOKS. It is the first opportunity I have had to ask for the poor privilege of making a minority report.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There was nothing said about it in the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not count even a unit in the committee. I desire at least to have the humble privilege, which all the precedents hitherto recognize, to make a minority report. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not violate that poor privilege.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman propose to make it now?

Mr. BROOKS. I would not prefer to make it now, but I could make it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I may not object to the minority report when it comes in, but I do object to granting the gentleman power to make a minority report at a future time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There is great diversity of opinion on subjects of this kind, and I feel reluctant always to crowd a minority. I shall give notice, therefore, that to-morrow, at half past one o'clock, I shall ask for a vote on this bill. In the mean time gentlemen may discuss it. I think most of the time will be given to the opposition.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand that the gentleman postpones the bill, but only gives notice that he will ask for a vote to-morrow at half past one o'clock p. m.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir. I move to recommit the bill and the pending amendment, so as to keep the matter before the House as it is at the present time.

Mr. WOOD. I ask to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. An amendment is not in order pending a motion to recommit.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the bill come up in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will come up in preference to any other business.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If there is to be any minority report it should be made this session.

The SPEAKER. Consent to make a minority report has not been granted.

Mr. CHANLER addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is supplemental, as its title indicates, to "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867. This bill seems, by its terms and language, to be devised only to more firmly rivet the chains of bondage on the white men of the South; to degrade them and to elevate the negroes of the South to a position of equality and fraternity; and, as far as possible, to prevent the people of the South, who, like the laboring classes of the North and West, are borne down by the burden of oppressive taxation, from having a vote or a voice in the Government, while the bondholders and the wealthy nabobs, who perhaps made their money as shoddy contractors, are, through what is called "New England ideas," ruling the South, the West, and the North with a rod of iron. This bill does not seem to me to be gotten up with any reference to the Constitution. The civil authorities are to be overthrown. Some military gentleman, when he sees proper, can displace a judge of the supreme court, or any other judicial tribunal, and its functions must cease altogether or another be appointed in place of the one who incurs the displeasure of some petty military officer. Others have discussed the provisions of the bill, and I shall confine myself more especially to the general effect which such legislation is calculated to produce, particularly in a Government framed like ours.

Ever since the close of the war, and for some time before it, the course of policy adopted by my friends on the other side of the House has clearly indicated that party success is their paramount object, and that political and social equality of all races, and especially the African race, is the hobby upon which to ride successfully to the goal of their ambition. A dismembered Union has nothing in its condition, presents no picture to their eyes, which in the least serves to check them in their mad career. Cabal and caucus settle questions of the gravest moment and deepest import to the Government. By a secret decree made, not as in former times, in the happy days of the Republic, any measure is brought forward and under the lash of the previous question and the spur of passion and fanaticism is passed and becomes a law—no discussion, no amendment being allowed. A few words of discussion have been allowed on this bill. A State of this Union returns a Democratic delegation to this House, and forthwith willing witnesses, perhaps by perjury, send in ex parte statements, and charges of disloyalty are freely applied to honorable gentlemen. They are not allowed to be sworn in and take their seats on this floor; and thus another star is stricken from our flag, or at least eclipsed.

The negro having been a slave from the remotest period of authentic history, it seems that the Radicals are now making him bear the burden of the Radical party of to-day. On his broad, black shoulders gentlemen are carried into office and power; and in order to make the African contribute so far as he can toward perpetuating the despotic power of the present dominant party, he is patted on the back, called "a man and a brother," and promised equal, social, political, and domestic rights. The tenor of the bill now pending, as well as the bills which it is intended to explain, and indeed nearly all the legislation of the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth Congresses, and the first session of the present one, seems first to wipe out all distinction on account of race, except so far as the sweeping disfranchisement of white men is concerned, and thereby secure to radicalism a permanent position and a continuance of power politically.

Would it not be well to pause in this wild career of fanaticism, and inquire whether the laws enacted and being enacted by the party in power are beneficial to the Government and just to the white race, and whether the present bill is just and constitutional? It is on account of the effect which laws tending to establish and place the negro, the Indian, Chinese, Esquimaux, white, and all other possible races of men on an equality before the law, at the ballot-box, in the jury-box, in the legislative halls, in the social and domestic circle, and in the bedchamber, will have upon our free institutions—hitherto free—and upon the white race, that I propose to call the attention of the House to the question now pending.

If the whites, the negroes, Indians, Chinese, and Esquimaux, are all alike, I mean the races or types alike, in all that goes to make up and constitute their humanity, the humanity of each race; alike in their intellectual capacities, their anatomical structures, their physiological developments and their longevity, then our Radical friends may with some degree of propriety and assurance call them "men and brothers." I admit their humanity, that they are all men and not monkeys; but I deny the "brotherhood;" I deny the fraternity.

In support of this proposition I would say: 1. They do not look alike; no two of the types or races look alike; they are unlike in form, in color, in size, and weight.

2. They are unlike in each and every point and particular which distinguish men from beasts, as above stated; in shape, in weight, in height, and also in the duration of life.

When speaking of these differences let me be understood throughout my remarks that I speak of the average height, longevity, and weight of adult healthy men belonging to the different races or types.

To illustrate: the Caucasian (a name erroneously but generally given to different distinct races of fair-skinned men)—the Caucasian, or white man is five feet and between nine and ten inches high; the Esquimaux four feet and seven inches high; the Mongolian type, to which the Chinese belong, five feet and between four and five inches high. The Caucasian type weighs one hundred and fifty-six pounds; the Esquimaux ninety-seven pounds; the Mongol one hundred and thirty-two pounds. The Caucasian lives to be sixty-six years and four months old; the Mongol to be fifty-three years old; and the Esquimaux to be forty-one years old. The life insurance companies of Europe and America all predicate their policies upon the fact that white men and women live to be sixty-six years and four months old on an average. This average is based upon observations on the duration of more than six million lives. The statistics of the British and French armies are full of evidence going to show and to prove that in height and weight no two races of men have yet been found alike. The feet and hands, the arms and legs are unlike in measurement. The hand of the negro is one twelfth longer and one-tenth broader than the hand of the white man; his foot is one eighth longer and one ninth broader than the white man's; his forearm is one tenth shorter; and the same is true of the bones from the knee to the ankle. These last stated measurements are given upon the authority of Sir Charles Lyell. There has not yet been found, as far as I can learn, one bone in the skeleton of the white man which does not differ both in weight and measurement from its fellow-bone which may belong to any other type of man. The skeleton is unlike in the whole in weight and measurement, and unlike in every bone of it. These average differences ought to be conclusive that they cannot and do not belong to the same type; and these unvarying dissimilarities must be produced by causes which are not accidental.

But perhaps the cranium or skull, being the cap, so to speak, of the vertebral column, and a very important bone in all races, will best serve to illustrate these differences further. The capacity, by measurement, of the skull of the white man is ninety-seven cubic inches; that is the average of one thousand or any greater number of skulls; the negro has sixty-six cubic inches; the North American Indian has sixty-three cubic inches; the native Australian has fifty-six cubic inches. These measurements have been taken with the greatest possible accuracy, and the fact of an average difference in each type positively demonstrated. A line drawn across the diameters of the head has an average difference in length in each type, thus showing that the shape as well as size of the skull is different in each race. Ethnologists are nearly, if not entirely, unanimous in the affirmation of the following propositions, and are always ready to submit them for examination:

1. That cranial differences, both in shape and capacity, constitute an enduring and, therefore, a strictly reliable basis upon which to establish not only a true classification of the types, but also to establish the fact that they are different creations.

2. That the value of this evidence consists more in the permanence thereof than in its magnitude; its changeless constancy entitles it to the character of a specific, positive value.

3. Each cranial type admits of certain limited variations; both in shape and size; but the average of both shape and capacity never changes; it depends upon the type form.

4. These cranial type forms increase in number and variety as you go from the pole toward the equator; in other words, the lower forms are only found in regions of extreme heat or extreme cold; the higher forms occupy the temperate latitudes.

5. That all type forms and typical characteristics have an indissoluble connection with climate.

Dr. Knox, one of the most learned and best posted lecturers on ethnology it has ever been my good fortune to find, in speaking of differences in the organism, &c., says:

"The races of men, when carefully examined, will be found to show remarkable organic differences. In a dark or colored person, whose structure I had an opportunity of observing, the nerves of the limbs were at least a third less than those of the Saxon man of the same height."

Professor Agassiz makes similar statements.

Then in this instance at least the nervous system seems different; and, judging by analogy, we might with propriety conclude that the difference is an average one.

The same author says again:

"I am prepared to assert that race is everything in human history."

D'Israeli has said the same thing, or makes one of his characters say so—"that the races of men are not the result of accident; that they are not convertible into each other by any contrivance whatever. The eternal laws of nature must prevail over protocols and dynasties!"

He might have added Congresses—

"fraud, that is, the law, and brute force, that is, the bayonet, may effect much, have effected much, but they cannot alter nature."

We were informed by some learned gentleman who published an article in Harper's Monthly a few years since entitled "The Cooking of Men"—I give the name of the article from memory, but it was some such name—that "the difference in the color of men was caused by the sun's rays and by climate; that when men wandered off into Africa and elsewhere in the torrid zone, the intense heat of the sun "cooked" them black;" and it was so hot, too, I presume, that it "cooked" their hair into wool. He quit, evidently satisfied that he had forever settled the question of the unity of races in his favor, and proved that Adam was the first great father of all, and Noah was our next great father. But will his theory stand the test of examination? If the heat of the sun "cooks" men black, how does it come that there are so many "cooked" yellow, and some quite a pale yellow, in the torrid zone and in Africa under the equator, which is proved by all travelers through Africa? And again, if heat "cooks" men black and brown and yellow, cold ought to bleach them white. If I mistake not the same author told the public in the same "culinary" article that the Arctic or cold regions produced white men and animals, and spoke of white bears, white owls, white sea fowls, &c., as the effect or product of cold. If he did not, it was some one else, and it has been often so stated. Now, the fact is that the Fins and Laps and Esquimaux are all dark skinned men, the latter nearly black.

Climate furnishes testimony as to where the different races of men originated; and I affirm that man cannot live any great length of time and enjoy good health outside of the zoölogical realm, so to speak, where he was originally created. This, of course, is only a general truth, for there have been individuals belonging to some of the types who have sojourned in widely different latitudes, and in a few instances have enjoyed good health to old age; but these are only exceptions to the general rule.

The Medical Director General of the British army in India, in his report for 1860, says:

"Englishmen cannot be acclimated to India; the longer they live there the more unhealthy they become; that children of English parentage cannot be raised in that climate. That although they may reside in the most healthy part of the country, and be subject to no acute diseases, nor to any of malarial origin, yet they will very soon lose all appearances of good health and become sallow and emaciated as well as sluggish in both body and mind; and that persons of forty-five years of age after a residence of ten years in India will look as old as Englishmen do at home at sixty-five."

It is also stated on good authority that the oldest English regiment in India, "The Bombay Tafts," although marriages with British females have both been encouraged and consummated, has never been able since the time of Charles II to raise drummer boys enough to supply the regiment.

Extensive inquiries have been made by the head of the Bureau of Military Statistics in England of Englishmen not connected with the army, but who reside in different and distant southern latitudes, and everywhere in the torrid zone where white men live at all, and all of them, with hardly a single exception, are in bad health, and their children all die except such as are sent home to England.

Ethnologists hold that man can create nothing; no new species have appeared for some thousands of years. The immortal Cuvier held until the day of his death that there are no hybrid races of beasts—at least, none fertile, none reproducing and self-supporting. Nature puts a stop to monstrosities. Mulattoes and hybrids, of all races and types, are nuisances in nature. When the Spaniards took possession of the islands and the central part of America, of Mexico for instance, they killed as many of the indigenous inhabitants as possible, and they only ceased the slaughter because they wanted laborers to till the soil. "The old Spaniard was unequal to this; he was out of his element; he was an exotic." Then came the mixture of the Celt-Iberian with the Indian blood, the product being a kind of mulatto or half-breed. But the supplies of Spanish blood, so to speak, having been cut off almost entirely when Mexico cut loose from the mother Government, the mulatto must cease too; for as a hybrid he becomes non-productive after a time if he only intermarries with the mulatto or half-breed. He can no longer go back to the Spanish blood; that stock has ceased; of necessity, then, he is forced upon the Indian breed. Thus the Spanish blood disappears, and with it the half-breed, and the population retrogrades toward the indigenous inhabitants, and is again becoming Indian. The barbarous and cruel Juarez is an Indian, full blooded. As it is with Mexico so it is with Peru. Mr. Canning made his celebrated boast in the English Parliament that he had created the republics of Mexico and Peru, Columbia and Bolivia. He might boast, but there was not much to boast about if he did make them. He might make republics, but he could not make races of men, and no mixed race ever did govern themselves, especially of the dark skinned races.

History shows us that during the period of Rome's conquests we find no amalgamation of races. In the palmy days of Greece it was the same. Ireland, although seven hundred years under the English yoke of bondage and oppression, is still Celtic, not Saxon nor Norman. Wales has remained Celtic since the invasion of Julius Caesar, or from the first account that history gives us of the island; the Caledonian Celt still lingers in his native highlands. No amalgamation has taken place between the Celt and Saxon. It was not the fault of the Saxon, however. You may transplant the Cimbrian Celt of Wales, the Irish Celt, the Caledonian Celt to another climate, to a brighter sky, to a more fertile land, to a larger field of life and operations, and he is still the Celt; still his love for his clan or his kindred; still sings the "Exile of Erin," or "Cush-la-Machree," the "Blue Bells of Scotland," or "Pleasant Paths." The inhabitants of Lower Canada are as thoroughly Celtic to-day as they were when the French first settled that country. Climate has but little to do with race further than to show where the races respectively originated, and it has much to do with that. It has no influence, I mean, in permanently altering the varieties or races of men; it sometimes destroys them, but it cannot change them into any other race. The Esquimaux, although living among eternal snows, are nearly as black as negroes; and the Tasmanians, natives of Oceania and Australia, although enjoying a climate milder than that of England, are blacker, if possible, than a negro; and again, the Dutch families who settled in Southern Africa three hundred years ago are as fair now and as pure in Saxon blood as the Hollander at home. On the tombs of Egypt, the most valuable of all existing records, there stands the negro, the Jew, the Copt, the Phœnician, the Sarmatian, just as we find the same races in life to-day. Thousands of years have not in the least changed them. The type once formed never changes. Men are totally different creations; they are men, but not brothers; they are not equals, not endowed alike by the Creator, and it is only folly for man to try to join together what God has separated so widely and so distinctly. Nature, under the command that each shall bring forth fruit after its kind, has resisted the efforts of the Chinese for thousands of years to deform the foot of a Chinese woman. The foot of the infant, male or female, when born is natural and not deformed until deformity is forced upon that of the infant by its celestial parents; some of whom, under the civil rights bill, are now or soon will be voters and free American citizens, although recently the subjects of his celestial highness, "Wisdom's Glory," the Emperor of China.

Hippocrates, a truly scientific Greek, informs us that he found a race of people, which he denominated Macrocephali, inhabiting at that time the shores of the Euxine sea. He describes them as a race with narrow, elongated heads and depressed foreheads, like our North American Indian citizens, like Mr. Blackhawk and Mr. Osceola, and especially resembling the Carib and Chenook. He fancied that, perhaps, the peculiarity in the shape of their heads was caused by external pressure at first, but that in time the pressure became unnecessary, and what he considered a malformation

(and especially was it so when compared with the beautiful Greek heads of that time) had become hereditary. Such is not the case. If thousands of years cannot change the foot of a Chinese woman in the least, we must infer that the head of a man would not change either. "Since the days of Galen corsets have been worn. He complained of them, and ascribed to them all sorts of deformities of the chest and spine; yet all the tight-lacing of all the women has not made these deformities hereditary." Dr. Knox shrewdly remarks that in his opinion "all matrons still produce virgin daughters." The Jews have practiced circumcision as long as we have any account of them; so have many, if not most of the African tribes and eastern nations; yet the deformity, for such it is, has not become hereditary. These things all go to show and prove that the type once made, once created, is unalterable. There is not a single recorded instance where any of these deformities became transmissible by hereditary descent.

Dr. Knox says:

"Varieties in form proceed only to a certain length; they are constantly checked by two laws, these laws maintaining species as they exist—first, the tendency to reproduce the specific form instead of the variety; second, non-viability, non-reproduction: that is, extinction."

This it is which checks deformations of all kinds; and some medical writers seem to think that varieties in form are found to be more common in those who die young than in those reaching adult years, as if the very circumstance of these internal deformities or varieties, however unimportant they may seem, coincided at least, if they were not the efficient cause of early decay of the vital powers and of premature death.

Dr. Knox says so, and I think he is certainly correct in his remarks upon this point; and so far as that variety or monstrosity called mulatto is concerned, their term of life is much shorter than that of either of their parents. Who ever saw a very old mulatto? There may be such a thing, but it is an exception to the general rule. This fact alone proves the white and black races to be totally different and distinct creations.

It has been remarked that man cannot live and enjoy good health for any great length of time outside of the zoological realm in which he was created. I will now add that this matter is not controlled by parallels of latitude or longitude, nor by isothermal lines. Buffon spoke of centers of creation, and seemed, although not very pointedly, to fix continents or large bodies of land as these centers. But the "centers of creation," as ethnologists seem to understand the term, is the locality or zoological realm in which men were created, and to which the different races are respectively indigenous.

Ethnologists hold on this subject as follows:

1. That the earth is naturally divided into zoological realms, and that each realm possesses not only a climate but an animal and vegetable kingdom peculiarly its own.

2. That the animals of each realm originated in that realm, and that there is no consanguinity with the animals of realms, so to speak, other than that one where they were originally created.

3. That each realm has a group of human races, which, though not identical with each other in either physical structure or intellectual organism, are nevertheless closely allied, one with the other, in many general appearances; but they are totally and radically unlike and different from the types belonging to any other zoological realm. Such as, for illustration, the white races of Europe and the Mongols of Asia.

4. The types of man which belong to these realms ante-date by more than one hundred thousand years all human records, and probably all Iconographic and all Monumental representations; but they originated where they now live.

5. These types of men which belong to different and distant realms are separated by specific differences both in structure and intellect, and these differences are as plainly marked as are the characteristics which distinguish the horse and the ox.

6. When any of these types of men depart from the realm in which they are found they fail first to be healthy, and next the children born out of their natural realms incline to monstrosities and deformities, and their term of life is abbreviated; and when they depart from their realms widely they perish utterly.

The natural law which confines man to the zoological realm where he can live in health is an unalterable and inexorable one.

History is full of examples and proofs sustaining these propositions. It tells us that the Roman empire at one time extended from the Tigris and Euphrates on the east to the Forth and Clyde on the west. All that part of the continent of Africa north of the tropics was said to be Roman. Italy Roman! Where now are the Romans? Where are the descendants of Romulus and Remus and their compeers? What races have they destroyed? They controlled the world for about fifteen hundred years and, as has been well said by another, "they are now of no more note than the ancient Scythians or Mongols or Copts or Tartars. They established themselves nowhere as Romans; they destroyed no other race; they supplanted no other race; and in looking over the map of their empire you cannot find a physical vestige of the race, neither on the Thames, the Danube, the Rhine or the Guadalquivir, the Rhone or the Nile. Italy itself is almost clear of them. Southern Italy was Grecia Magna before they invaded it. Sicily is even now more Greek than Italian: Byzantium and York were Roman cities." But abundant proofs exist of a similar character in regard to other dominant and conquering races. The Phœnicians controlled northern Africa for centuries, yet they never destroyed or supplanted the native races.

The French nation, which is purely Celtic, have recently furnished proof, and are lately adding to the testimony, that although they are now masters of a portion of the southern shore of the Mediterranean, as much as ever the Romans or the Phœnicians were, still they cannot make it a French country.

In a report made on the subject by the head of one of the French bureaus, about five years ago, its author says:

"Had the French Government known at the beginning that Europeans would die in Algeria at the rate of nine per cent. annually, as they really do, they would never have undertaken to cultivate the soil of Africa with European labor: that the knowledge upon that subject, by this experiment, has cost the French Government more than one hundred million pounds sterling and the lives of more than one hundred thousand men."

And then adds, by way of comment:

"European statesmen must learn that European colonies cannot be planted and made prosperous outside of European latitudes—that men cannot live long outside of latitudes in which they were created."

Dr. Knox says:

"The Greeks who, under Alexander, marched victoriously to the Indus supplanted no other race. Rome and Carthage failed; Attila and his Huns also failed; and so did the Mongol. The remnant of the Huns in Hungary now struggle for existence; they are interlopers, seemingly among the Slavonian race, and will probably perish. But neither have the Slavonians succeeded in supplanting the Italian, though masters, under the name of Austrian and German, for nearly ten centuries. For at least two thousand years have the Scandinavian and South Germans made war on the Celtic race in the west of Europe, and made head against the Slavonian and Sarmatian (or Muscovite) races in the east, without advancing a single step. These races hold the same position to each other which they did in the remotest period of authentic history."

"The whole force of the so-called German empire, headed by Austria, could not dislodge the Slavonian from Bohemia; the Norman, though he met in south England a kindred race, could not destroy the Saxon race of North England. To this day the country seems to be divided between them, notwithstanding the centralizing influence of Flemish London. The Celts still hold the western limits of Britain and Ireland just as they did before the period of authentic history."

The Mongolian is found traveling to-day on the steppes of Asia with his hut or tent on his cart, drawn by oxen, precisely as in the days of Herodotus. The race has never altered in any way.

The rule is true and general that men are found now as races or types where they first originated. It may not be improper to add another item of proof on the subject of climate; the principle of which is in daily operation. All the old and well established life insurance companies in this country forfeit their policies when individuals whose lives are insured go south of thirty-six degrees, or north of fifty, or fifty-two degrees of north latitude. The history of all the missionaries to southern or extreme northern latitudes corroborates the testimony of military statistics on this point. Men were made and suited to and for the locality where they were originally created, and their physical constitutions and organisms cannot permanently endure any other climate or locality.

But some of our people who pretend to see in the Indian, the Chinaman, the Esquimaux, and especially the African, "a man and a brother," claim that all the wide and impassable differences which are found between the races or types of men have been produced by accidental causes, by climate, and by amalgamations. I have already, for the present at least, sufficiently answered the climatic part of this proposition, and have only to say that if it be true, as held by my Radical friends, that the negro is "a man and a brother," that he is the offspring of Adam, that there was, in other words, but one race at first, how there could have been "amalgamations?" I cannot imagine. Amalgamation, in the sense in which they use it, implies a plurality of races, just what ethnologists claim; but in fact it upsets the radical theory of the "unity of races," upon which must depend their whole argument in favor of "equality and fraternity." For as soon as they admit that the races are of different origins they can no longer claim that all races are equal any more than they can claim that the horse and the ass are equal. The principle on which the argument rests is identical.

But amalgamation, or miscegenation as it is now, perhaps, more elegantly styled, bears upon this question of origin of races most important testimony. The Ethnological Society of France instituted a series of experiments on the subject of amalgamations and the production of hybrid races between animals; and they gave it a close and thorough investigation. This was about the year 1841 or 1842. They introduced, and kept up for a number of years, in the zoölogical gardens at Paris, a series of experiments on the production of hybrid races of beasts. They had the wolf and the jackal, the dog and the fox, and a great number of other animals, which had been considered only different varieties of the same races, together; and after the third generation they all became sterile. They extended inquiries and made examinations upon the subject of amalgamations between different races of men. The Ethnological Society of Germany, following in a like examination, came to the same general conclusions to which they did, namely, that there are no hybrid races of either men or beasts in the world. This is the same conclusion to which all really true observers have come; among them Alexander Von Humboldt. I admit that Humboldt did become tintured, to some degree, with the "transcendental philosophy" of south Germany—of Oken, Spix, Lamarck, and Geoffroy; but it never led him away from the main fact that the races or types of men are different totally and radically, anatomically, physiologically, and intellectually, and different creations.

Let those "earnest loyal men," as they are pleased to style themselves, who think, or pretend to think, that all these inferior races of men for whom they entertain such high opinions, such deep affections, as enable them to legislate for their special benefit—let these "earnest" men who, with the utmost gravity, when speaking of the negro, ask the question, "is he not a man and a brother?"—let these gentlemen examine the writings of Leibig, of Habersham, of Gliddon, Francis Pulszky, Alfred Murray, J. C. Nott, and Professor Agassiz, all of whom have bestowed great attention to the history of the human races, and they will find that every one of those learned and distinguished gentlemen, without a single exception, concur in the correctness of the following conclusions:

1. That marriages between individuals who belong to different types, or stocks, do often produce numerous offspring; but that marriages between any of these children of mixed blood produce only few children; and the second generation still fewer; and almost all which are produced by the third generation will die in infancy, while the fourth generation is almost always childless; and of the fifth generation there is not in all the world an individual twenty years old.

2. These individuals of mixed blood inherit all the physical diseases and all the mental infirmities of both parents, producing an average standard of physical endurance and mental power below that of either of the parents; yet it is true there are some individuals of this kind who have great personal beauty and some of great physical strength, and others again of real intellectual power, but they are only rare exceptions to the general rule.

3. These persons of mixed blood are destitute of all distinct type forms, both as relates to anatomical structure and intellectual organization; in them the type is broken.

Those "earnest" gentlemen are also respectfully referred to the following extract from the pen of the celebrated Professor Agassiz:

"I have pointed out over a hundred specific differences between the bony and nervous system of the white man and negro. Indeed, their frames are alike in no particular. There is not a bone in the negro's body that is relatively the same shape, size, articulation, or chemically of the same composition, as that of the white man. The negro's bones contain a far greater percentage of encephalic salts than those of the white man. Even the negro's blood is chemically a very different fluid from that which courses in the veins of the white man. The whole physical organization of the negro differs quite as much from the white man's as it does from that of the chimpanzee; that is, in his bones, muscles, nerves, and fibers. The chimpanzee has not much further to progress to become a negro than the negro has to become a white man. This fact science inexorably demonstrates."

"Climate has no more to do with the difference between the white man and negro than it has with that between the negro and the chimpanzee, or than it has between the horse and the ass, or the eagle and the owl. Each is a distinct and separate creation. The negro and the white man were created as specifically different as the owl and the eagle. They were designed to fill different places in the system of nature. The negro is no more a negro by accident or misfortune than the owl is the kind of bird he is by accident or misfortune. The negro is no more the white man's brother than the owl is the sister of the eagle, or than the ass is the brother of the horse. How stupendous, and yet how simple, is the doctrine that the Almighty Maker of the universe has created different species of men, just as he has different species of the lower animals, to fill different places and offices in the grand system of nature."

The mixing of races—amalgamation, miscegenation—is a fatal proceeding; fatal alike to the races, fatal to the family, and a degeneration to the individual. It violates the laws of organism, it defaces the image, it joins together what God has separated, it creates monstrosities and nuisances in human nature.

Miscegenation is a subject of vast importance to society, to posterity, and especially at the present time to the statesmen of our country. For it is true in history and true in science that nations which allow their national stock to be adulterated, which tolerate amalgamation with other national types, will perish certainly, and perish forever. I have said that this is a question of the utmost importance to the statesmen of America—of that portion of it especially which once bore deservedly the name of "The United States of America;" and I say now, with all the candor possible, that if those statesmen, those gentlemen who are molding and shaping the policy and laws and regulations for our Government, fail to be guided by experience and science and history in shaping a policy to prevent amalgamation, miscegenation, social and political equality of the different races, white, black, red, yellow, and brown, our nation will be suffocated, as it were, by these foolish and suicidal projects, these Utopian schemes of equality of races.

But my Radical friends will laugh to scorn all such warnings. They sneer at the idea. They talk of the Anglo-Saxon race, and some of them without much knowledge, in fact, of race or type; they say America is ours, ours to possess, ours to enjoy, ours to control, ours to transmit; but if their present line of policy be carried out, they will have the "melancholy pleasure," if such a phrase is allowable, of transmitting this glorious heritage, purchased by the blood and sufferings of our revolutionary sires, and preserved by the patriotism and valor of their descendants, to a hybrid race—a set of mongrels, mulattoes, crosses between Chinese, Esquimaux, whites, mulattoes, Indians, half-breeds, and nondescripts. My Radical friends, who see in these predictions nothing except something to laugh at, and think that the country is safe—that nobody's daughter will marry a negro, at least they know theirs will not, and as they frequently say, they are not afraid of a negro, &c.—are only reenacting in a very plain way what has often happened in history. They virtually say, we are the natives of the soil; we control its destinies; we own all this country; we are rich; we are powerful; we do not fear the negro, the Indian, the Chinese, the Esquimaux, the world, the flesh, the devil, nor the Democratic party. Such, perhaps, were the feelings, if not the exact language of the Roman, "when calmly reposing on the banks of the Ouse, he transmitted letters to his friends at Rome or Antioch, Rhodes or Carthage, Syracuse or Byzantium; such, no doubt, were the thoughts of Cortes when he unfurled the Spanish flag in Mexico; such were the thoughts of Attila, when, penetrating into Europe, he scarcely saw an enemy worthy his arms. Sesostris (if there was ever such a person) had dreams like these; and Tamerlane, Zengis Khan, and Napoleon at Moscow." But all these reckoned without their host; that host is nature! whose laws are not human laws; who consults no man, not even my venerable friend, the leader of the Radicals in this House; but who bids us all look back at what has transpired; who points with unerring finger toward futurity and bids us look forward, chronicle events, and see history repeat itself in this particular, through the laws passed and being passed by those in power in the legislative department of this once happy Government. "Experience keeps a dear school," &c.

There are two other subjects or sciences which bear important testimony relative to the origin of types of the human races: I allude to embryology and cranioscopy. I do not profess to understand either of these subjects or sciences thoroughly, but the professors of embryology assert, and they are unanimous in the assertion, that the law of life which operates to organize man in his earliest moment, that the spermatozoa and the cell formation are entirely different in each type of the human race; and that in this department of her work, as in every other, nature displays infinite variety. I repeat, then, the declaration of these learned gentlemen, that under a powerful microscope the fact that the different types of men are absolutely different creations is no longer an open question. The law which operates to organize and the being organized are different from the first and different totally.

But quite the most curious and perhaps the most important discovery which cranioscopy has made relates to the position which each type holds in the scale of civilization. It is found that the races of men whose brain measures sixty-four cubic inches or less are always barbarous and heathen people; that they have not intellectual power sufficient to frame a government nor to enact laws; in other words, to make for themselves any form of government better than heathenism makes. The races of men whose brain measures from seventy-four to eighty-four cubic inches are the unprogressive people. They are half civilized or half barbarous; the governments they found are always despotic; the laws they enact are always peculiar, and are different from the laws enacted by any other type of people.

The people of China, Japan, India—in short the greater portion of the types of man—are embraced and included between sixty-eight and eighty-four cubic inches of brain.

The nationalities whose brain measures ninety-four cubic inches or upward are the only nationalities who are progressive and enlightened, who are capable of cultivating the physical sciences to practical results, and whose governments are made for the benefit of the people.

Cranioscopy declares that the different types have each a different organization; in other words, a different creation; and it further declares that there are as plainly different kinds of men having different kinds of humanities in the world as there are different kinds of beasts; that the horse and the ox are not more certainly different creations than the white man and the Indian, the Indian and the African, the African and the Chinese, the Chinaman and the Esquimaux.

Cranioscopy maps out the types and shows to what countries they belong; what realms produce each type; that they are never produced except in those realms; that race and climate are inseparably connected with type form; and that science and civilization are also inseparable.

Physiology testifies that the types of man are different creations because diseases affect them differently. The negro will live and enjoy good health where the white man will die suddenly of yellow fever, for instance; and he will not only live and enjoy good health but will multiply type or race rapidly where the sun is 141° Fahrenheit, where the air is literally filled with malarial poison, and when and where the white man could not live three days, perhaps not three hours.

People are as easily known, races are as easily distinguished from each other, by the customs and usages to which they conform, by the habits of their societies, by the laws they enact and the forms of government under which they live, as by any anatomical or physiological differences, or by the color of the skin.

The North American Indian never made a law or a government—the white man never lived without law and government. Sixty-three cubic inches of brain are insufficient. The Indian was created for a savage and barbarous life. He is even now, in following the instincts of his barbarity on the plains, hastening the extinction of his race—which race is being rapidly broken up to give place to a higher and a better type of men. The Indian is different from the white man and from every other type of man—different physically, anatomically, intellectually, morally, socially—different in all that constitutes humanity.

There is a natural antagonism between the races called prejudice; but it is not prejudice; it is not a creature of class or caste; it is not confined to the low and ignorant, but it is found among the highly educated, cultivated, and enlightened. It is the middle wall of partition between the races, set and built up there by the Almighty. This feeling or principle, commonly called prejudice, is a part of type; a part of life; an evidence of different humanities and different creations, and different and distinct races.

The principal distinguishing characteristics between man and the beasts have been enumerated or stated by some eminent author, as follows:

"Man has always and everywhere his standard estimate of right and wrong, his self-esteem, his ideas of excellence and degradation, his judgment of propriety and folly, his consciousness of intellectual power, his belief in a future state of existence, and his religious nature."

Beasts have none of these. Such feelings and sentiments are the distinguishing traits of human nature, and all mankind possess them, no matter how low in the scale of civilization they may be.

But while this is true, it must be borne in mind that these faculties, feelings, and attributes—these distinguishing traits—are always different in each different race or type: The humanity, the anatomy, the physiology, the intellectuality are constantly unlike. The standard of right and wrong, the moral affections, the social affections and feelings, the ideas of government, are all unlike. The intellectual power varies from fifty-six cubic inches to one hundred and fourteen cubic inches. I cannot now think of a better comparison or illustration than to compare the intellectuality and humanity of the different races to the different kinds of grain. Some are wheat, some rye, some barley, some oats, some corn—all grain, but yet different totally and radically; each kind a different creation, a different kind of grain, a different crop; so with the intellectualities and humanities of the different races—all humanities, yet each and all of them of different kinds of humanity, totally and radically different; each clearly, broadly, and plainly human—made equally in them. "image." There is no monkey about them.

These differences are as plainly marked as the differences between the horse and the ox; between the ostrich and the duck; between the vulture and the robin, or between the swan and the mocking-bird.

Who would think of feeding the Canary bird with the food of the eagle—the sparrow with the food of the ostrich—the humming-bird with the food of the vulture? Those who think that the negro or Esquimaux or Indian require the same intellectual entertainments, and are entitled to and qualified for the same rights and privileges as the white race, might do so; but none others—no right-minded, intelligent man would. If all birds could live on the same food, then all the races of men can live and enjoy the same privileges and enjoy the same happiness, in the same society and under the same laws. Our Radical friends, to use a figure of speech, are, by the legislation now proposed as well as by their general course of legislation on the negro equality question, attempting to force the food suitable for the eagle down the throat of the blackbird; and to starve the eagle until he agrees to become a wren or something less.

It is but just for me to state that for many of the ideas and thoughts contained in my remarks I am indebted to my esteemed and learned friend, Dr. O. White, of Toledo, Ohio.

I have discussed this question of races because it lies at the foundation of our social and political structure. All history shows that a free government, administered according to law, is impossible, unless the people who create the laws and accept them for their government are endowed with those qualities of mind and character which have never been exhibited by the negro race. The attempt to blend the races by the coercion of statutory enactments and military violence will be instinctively repelled by the white dominant race; and if this coercion should succeed, it would have no other result than a common degradation and a common ruin.

The most fearful thing now impending over us is the unblushing disregard of the Constitution and laws which the advocates of negro equality now manifest. They are intent upon, not only the amalgamation of races, but the utter destruction of our system of government and the erection of a vast consolidated empire to be administered upon the maxims of military despotism. Whenever a community shall fall under the suspicion of the central power, its laws, its traditions, whatever is consecrated by time, by custom, and by constitutions, will be swept away, and the will of a military commander, who is not responsible "to any officer of the United States Government," nor to the people, will become the supreme law.

At present this transcendent usurpation has for its avowed object the elevation of the negro race into a political power that may perpetuate the rule of the party that now governs and controls the country. But what may be its object to-morrow? What personal, what political right is sacred from its touch in any one of the States of the Republic? At what instant may not the leading men of this House precipitate legislation which will strike down by a single enactment the safeguards of every State and place the entire American people at the mercy of a faction which has seized upon all the powers of the Government?

Gentlemen console themselves no doubt with the reflection that they are increasing the strength of their party, and that that is a justification for every violation of the Constitution of their country. But let them be warned! The American people will never consent that this Government shall be administered in the interest alone of a party. There is a large mass of intelligence that cannot be permanently coerced by party commands. The people will resume the Government of their country; and the Constitution, with all its beneficent functions, will again be regarded as the supreme law of the land.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER announced the following select Committee on the Assassination of President Lincoln: BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts; SAMUEL SHELLABARGER of Ohio, GEORGE W. JULIAN of Indiana, HAMILTON WARD of New York, and SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ELDRIDGE, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Allen Axe, M. W. Nye, and J. Dixon, asking compensation for property lost on the Plains by Indian hostilities.

Also, the petition of 170 colored men, lately United States soldiers, residing in Kentucky, stating that the State laws deny them the right to testify in court; that they cannot therefore obtain redress for murder and outrage; that colored men have been murdered in cold blood, and not having the right to testify, the criminals go unpunished, and asking Congress to grant them the right of suffrage.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE: Resolution of the Publisher's Association of Wisconsin, for the abolition of the duty upon printing paper.

By Mr. HOLBROOK: A memorial of the Legislature of Idaho Territory, asking that the organic act of the Territory be amended increasing the jurisdiction of Justices of the peace.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Idaho Territory, praying for a division of Idaho and Washington Territories, and for the formation of an additional Territory, to be called Columbia.

By Mr. PHELPS: The memorial of Joseph B. Booth, reporting alleged abuses in the engravers' department of the Norfolk navy-yard.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. MYERS: A bill granting a pension to Isaac Preston, of Philadelphia, a sailor of the war of 1812.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. JAMES A. BAYARD, of Delaware, and Hon. D. S. NORTON, of Minnesota, appeared in their seats.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 181.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may have a little time for morning business before the Senate proceeds with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate will decide in reference to it. As it is now we are here chiefly upon this reconstruction business. I submit to my friend from Massachusetts whether we had not better get that out of the way as far as we can, and the other business can be done in the intermediate time.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to my friend that we had better follow the precedent that was quoted the other day, though not accurately quoted, of 1841, which I have before me. By that precedent it was established that the morning hour should be reserved. Senators perhaps are not aware, because the facts were not sufficiently brought out the other day—indeed they were not alluded to; I was not aware of them then—that the Democratic party at the time refused to accept Mr. Clay's proposition. They announced that at whatever hazard they would defeat it on this floor; they would not submit to any such restriction upon public business; and Mr. Clay was obliged to descend from the heights which he first occupied, though he by no means assumed such heights as have been assumed in this Chamber during the present session. He abandoned his proposition. I have before me the record and also the debate, which, when properly in order, I wish to present to the Senate. I do not wish to present it in this incidental way; but I wish to call up the proposition to rescind the resolution of last Friday, and on that to call the attention of the Senate to the only precedent which has been invoked for that extraordinary proceeding, and which I wish to show is entirely inapplicable and was not understood by the Senate. Therefore, if the Senator will simply follow what was the conclusion reached on that occasion, to allow the morning hour for general business, and allow me to call up my resolution to rescind the proposition of last Friday, I shall be thankful to him. I assure him I have no disposition to occupy one minute of time. I will abridge what I have to say just as much as possible, and shall say nothing except to speak of the result.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Massachusetts is certainly aware that that will have no bearing upon the bill which I desire to call up, because under the rule as it is adopted, this bill is strictly in order. Therefore we can proceed with this bill without any difficulty, and if it should be the opinion of the Senate afterward that it is better to rescind the resolution we can do so when it would have some practical effect. It would have no practical bearing upon the question which I desire to bring before the Senate; and therefore I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and that we had best go on with this bill which is clearly in order, and which he will not object to considering, because he is in favor of considering everything, and of course he ignores the subject which I desire to call now to the attention of the Senate, and it will only be a waste of so much time, if the Senate should agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, so far as this measure is concerned. So that in any event there is no practical importance in the Senator's suggestion at this time, and as this bill is in order and all agree that we should act upon it, I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will waive any objection he may have and proceed at once to the consideration of this measure.

Mr. SUMNER. I simply appeal to my friend. I am not going to oppose his bill in any form; but I appeal to him as on a question of the order of business, and I ask him if he will not allow me fifteen minutes or twenty minutes, whatever the time may be that it shall require, to call up my resolution and have a vote upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is aware that that will lead to discussion. Others will reply to him. He might limit his remarks to ten or fifteen minutes, but others would perhaps take an hour or two hours in reply.

Mr. SUMNER. Then let it be disposed of. It is a question on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not practically important now.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is practically important with a view to the public business, as some of us conceive, to have that question disposed of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator how he supposes we can dispose of it, when yesterday he gave notice that he should introduce, if necessary, a similar resolution every day?

Mr. SUMNER. I trust the Senate when they understand the subject will brush it away.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When they have done that, the Senator has given us notice that he will introduce another of similar import.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh no; if they brush it away, then I am silent. I assume the Senate would do right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose they do wrong? Mr. SUMNER. Then I should govern myself accordingly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely; and of course we gain nothing by allowing that resolution to be called up. We shall have it up every day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing all other business and proceeding to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 131) to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the tenth line of the sixth section there is a misprint of the letter "r," making the word read "officer," and it should be "office."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, no objection being made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding further with the consideration of this bill, I deem it proper to present to the Senate some of the considerations which, in my judgment, and in the judgment of the committee, have rendered this legislation necessary, and also to explain the provisions of the bill which has been reported.

The necessity for this legislation grows entirely out of what is conceived to be a misconception of the reconstruction acts passed at the former session of Congress. Properly interpreted and carried out in the spirit in which they were conceived, it is believed that this additional legislation would have been unnecessary. The occasion which gave rise to those reconstruction acts was this: it was believed on the part of the Congress of the United States that no legal governments existed in the rebellious States, and that those States were still properly subject to military control.

This was the theory upon which Congress acted. The want of legitimate civil governments was the evil which it was designed to remedy; and these bills known as the reconstruction acts were intended to furnish the machinery for inaugurating proper civil governments in those States, and restoring them to their legitimate positions in the Union.

If Congress was wrong in this position, then this whole legislation is wrong, has no foundation in the Constitution, and cannot be sustained for a moment.

What was the condition of these rebel States when these bills were passed? Six years before the legitimate State governments in every one of them had been overthrown by force of arms, and the enemies of the country had taken full and complete possession of them and set up hostile governments in every one of them. They were as completely hostile to the United States as was the Government of Great Britain during the war of 1812. They raised armies and sought to maintain their hostile attitude. Every vestige of State authority friendly to the United States was utterly overthrown. After a protracted war of four years, attended with great expense and great loss of life, the Government of the United States succeeded by force of arms in crushing out these inimical governments, in overthrowing the enemy. What then was the condition of the people in the spring of 1865 in all these rebel States? Confessedly, without any civil governments whatever. The governments which existed before the war had been for years extinct. The governments of the enemies of the country we ourselves by force of arms had destroyed.

As a necessity resulting from this conflict of arms and growing out of the belligerent character of this contest our military had control over the people of these States. Why? Because there was no other government there. The enemy government of course could not be tolerated, because at the expense of millions and hundreds of millions of money and thousands and hundreds of thousands of lives we had destroyed it. The enemies of the country had destroyed the legitimate governments which existed before the war. Then to prevent anarchy and to preserve the peace our military commanders had authority to control temporarily the people whom they had conquered; for this was a conquest; it was the overthrowing of the governments of the enemy; and the authority of our armies temporarily to govern the country they had conquered was just as complete in Carolina as it was in California when we conquered it from the Mexicans. I think all will admit that for some period of time—some may make it shorter than others, but for some period of time, whether it be a day or a week, a month or a year—the military had authority to preserve the peace and to govern the country until civil governments could be reinaugurated.

How long this military government should be continued is a question left to the discretion of the sovereign power of the United States, exercising its authority in the spirit of our institutions, and in subordination to the Constitution of the country. I agree that this military power should not be continued a day longer than is necessary to the restoration of civil governments which are loyal to the Union and true to the Constitution, but how long that is to be is to be decided by the circumstances of which the sovereign Government, the war-making power, the Congress of the United States, is the judge—not the Executive, not the judicial tribunals. It is a question over which the judicial tribunals can have no jurisdiction. They cannot try political questions, and they will be bound by the decision which the other departments of the Government make.

This military authority, in the absence of legislation by Congress, was continued for a time by the direction of the President of the United States, and rightly so. The President of the United States, then, while this military power was in existence, undertook to inaugurate civil governments in those States; and had the civil governments which he inaugurated been managed by men true to the country and loyal to the Union, they would have been recognized, and this whole question would have been settled long ago; but, unfortunately, the enemies of the country, the men who set up the hostile governments which we had spent so much blood and treasure to overthrow, took possession of the new governments. The Congress of the United States, when it assembled, finding this to be the condition of things, and that the President had withdrawn the military power and left these governments in the hands of the very men who had controlled them during the war, decided that they were not legal governments, but provisional merely; not absolutely null and void, I grant you, but existing by sufferance only; and Congress then proceeded to declare that there being no legal governments in these States, the military power which the President had prematurely and improperly withdrawn, in the absence of any law of Congress forbidding it, should be restored, and that the military power should be exercised over these States until civil governments could be set up therein, not inimical, but friendly to the Government of the United States.

Can there be any question of the power of Congress to enact such a law? I think not.

The military power over these rebel States did not cease the moment the conflict of arms ceased. It continued until the Government recognized some civil authority which had been established in those States; and the same principle, in this respect, applies to those States that would have applied to them had they been conquered from a foreign country. They had been completely under the control of the enemies of the country; and the Supreme Court, in one of the rooms of this Capitol, has decided that any man living within the limits of those States, whatever may have been his individual opinions, was liable to be treated as an enemy of the country, because he was living within the jurisdiction over which the enemies of the country held sway.

Now, sir, these are not new principles. I think every one of the principles which I have attempted to state was sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States years ago, in a unanimous opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, now, I regret to say, no more, who, within a few days, has departed from among us forever, and who, though a southern man, surrounded by southern prejudices and appealed to by southern influences to unite with his State when it went into secession, stood steadfast by the Union, and at the end of a long and useful public life died as he had lived, a true patriot. In this opinion, delivered by him in the case of Cross vs. Harrison, in 1853, in commenting upon the condition of California, he lays down principles which I think applicable to the condition of the rebel States. During the war with Mexico our military authorities took possession of what is now the State of California. Colonel Mason was appointed Governor. He was an officer in the Army. He was appointed civil Governor; that is, he performed the duties of civil Governor, being detailed for that purpose; and Lieutenant Halleck, now Major General Halleck, was appointed secretary of state, and they established a government which lasted during the war with Mexico. After the treaty of peace, and California was ceded to the United States, that government still continued, Congress not having yet legislated for the people of California, and the officers detailed by military authority for the collection of duties and for the performance of other official acts in that country continued in the discharge of their duties until Congress did legislate. The question came before the Supreme Court of the United States whether this government thus set up was a legitimate government; first, during the war, we having conquered the country from the enemy. Next, if valid while the war lasted, was it still valid after the war closed, and by the treaty of peace that country had been embraced within the limits of the United States? Both those questions were presented to the Supreme Court in the case to which I refer. The court say:

"The belligerent right of the United States to make a civil government in California when it was done, and to authorize it to collect tonnage and impose duties while the war continued, is admitted."

Nobody controverted that, it seems; but the question arose whether that government could continue after the treaty of peace; and this is what is said on that subject:

"The territory had been ceded as a conquest, and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. That sovereignty was the United States, under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with the power also to admit new States into this Union, with only such limitations as are expressed in the section in which this power is given. The government of which Colonel Mason was the executive had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It had been instituted during the war by the command of the President of the United States. It was the government when the territory was ceded as a conquest, and it did not cease as a matter of course or as a necessary consequence of the restoration of peace. The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the Army and Navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done. The right inference from the inaction of both is, that it was meant to be continued until it had been legislatively changed. No presumption of a contrary intention can be made. Whatever may have been the causes of delay, it must be presumed that the delay was consistent with the true policy of the Government. And the more so as it was continued until the people of the Territory met in convention to form a State government, which was subsequently recognized by Congress under its power to admit new States into the Union."

Further on, the court say:

"Our conclusion, from what has been said, is that the civil government of California, organized as it was from a right of conquest, did not cease or become defunct in consequence of the signature of the treaty or from its ratification. We think it was continued over a ceded conquest, without any violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, and that until Congress legislated for it the duties upon foreign goods imported into San Francisco were legally demanded and lawfully received by Mr. Harrison, the collector of the port, who received his appointment, according to instructions from Washington, from Governor Mason."

I know that a distinction may be attempted to be drawn between the condition of that country and that of the rebel States, because we conquered the rebel States from domestic enemies and California from foreign enemies; but does that alter the principle? Why was it necessary to establish a military government or a civil government through the military (for that is exactly what we have got in the South, military officers administering a civil government) in California? To prevent anarchy and preserve the peace of that country, and because without the authority of the military, we having destroyed the previously existing government, there would be no government. Was not that the precise condition of these rebel States? Does not everybody admit that? Did not the President say, when he undertook to institute civil governments there, that the close of the war left that people without any civil government whatever; and do we not all know such to be the fact? Then did not the same necessity exist for continuing this government of the military power until a civil government should be established and recognized by the legislative authority of the country?

I come now to consider for a few minutes the construction which the Attorney General has put upon these acts. He seems to suppose that the intention was not to subject the rebel States to military control. He says of the government which existed in each of these States, and which the President had aided in inaugurating, that—"It had all the characteristics and powers of a State government, legislative, judicial, and executive."

Is that true? Mr. Stanbery, in this very opinion, admits that the military commander was empowered for the purpose of preserving the peace, to—

"Allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders, or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose."

If it be true that the State government in any of these rebel States had all the characteristics and powers of a State government, legislative, judicial, and executive, was it competent for the Congress of the United States to pass a law declaring that a military tribunal might be erected in one of these States to take charge of the trial of criminals or of persons charged with the commission of criminal offenses? Could the Congress of the United States pass an act of that kind applicable to the State of New York or the State of Illinois? Does anybody pretend that? Surely not.

The Attorney General says further that this State government—

"Was in the full and lawful exercise of all these powers, except only that it was not entitled to representation as a State of the Union."

I have shown that that is not true even according to his own construction. Then he says:

"This existing government is not set aside; it is recognized more than once by the act. It is not in any one of its departments, or as to any one of its functions, repealed or modified by this act, save only in the qualifications of voters, the qualifications of persons eligible to office, the manner of holding elections, and the mode of framing the constitution of the State. The act does not in any other respect change the provisional government, nor does the act authorize the military authority to change it."

* * * "That constitution was to be changed in only one particular to make it acceptable to Congress, and that was in the matter of the elective franchise. The purpose, the sole object of this act is to effect that change, and to effect it by the agency of the people of the State, or such of them as are made voters, by means of elections provided for in the act, and in the mean time to preserve order and to punish offenders, if found necessary, by military commission."

In another place the Attorney General says:

"In effect it is a police power, and the protection here intended is protection of persons and property against violence, unlawful force, and criminal infraction."

Again, he says:

"If civil order is preserved, and criminals are duly prosecuted by the regular criminal courts, the military power, though present, must remain passive. Its proper function is to preserve the peace, to act promptly when the peace is broken, and restore order. When that is done, and the civil authority may again safely resume its functions, the military power becomes again passive, but on guard and watchful."

Now, sir, was any fact more notorious, not only here, but throughout the country, than that the Congress of the United States intended to put these rebel States under military control? The Attorney General ignores entirely that intention. What was the purpose of the legislation of Congress? Was it simply to establish a police force in the rebel States and to change the Constitution as to the right of persons to vote? Why, sir, these Halls have resounded for the last two years with complaints that these governments set up in the rebel States were disloyal. That was the trouble. They were in the hands of the enemies of the country, and it was to get rid of them entirely that Congress acted. And so the Attorney General, or if not the Attorney General, the President of the United States, (and we are to presume he acted by the advice of the Attorney General,) was of opinion when this reconstruction act was vetoed. Let us turn to the veto message and see what a different thing the reconstruction act then was from what it now is as represented by the Attorney General. The President said:

"The bill places all the people of the ten States therein named under the absolute dominion of military rulers."

Mr. Stanbery says it is a mere police power, and cannot interfere with the civil authority at all except when that authority fails in the prosecution of criminals. The President further adds:

"The military rule which it establishes is plainly to be used, not for any purpose of order or for the prevention of crime, but solely as a means of coercing the people into the adoption of principles and measures to which it is known that they are opposed."

He further says:

"The ten States named in the bill are divided into five districts. For each district an officer of the Army, not below the rank of brigadier general, is to be appointed to rule over the people; and he is to be supported with an efficient military force to enable him to perform his duties and enforce his authority. Those duties and that authority, as defined by the third section of the bill, are 'to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace or criminals.' The power thus given to the commanding officer over all the people of each district is that of an absolute monarch. His mere will is to take the place of all law. The law of the States is now the only rule applicable to the subjects placed under his control, and that is completely displaced by the clause which declares all interference of State authority to be null and void. He alone is permitted to determine what are rights of person or property, and he may protect them in such way as in his discretion may seem proper."

"The officer 'may allow local civil tribunals to try offenders,' but of course this does not require that he shall do so."

I have read enough to show that this bill was vetoed by the President of the United States for the very reason that it placed the people of the rebel States under military control; but now his Attorney General decides, and the President adopts the decision, that the people of those States are not placed under military control at all! Was ever contradiction more palpable? Let me now call attention to the act itself, for from its terms we can best ascertain what the intention of Congress was. Its preamble declares:

"Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States."

Sir, it is true, as the Attorney General says that here were perfect and complete governments, with all the powers of any State government, except only that they had not representation in the Congress of the United States, when the act itself declares that no legal State governments existed? But he says the act itself does afterward recognize governments as existing there? True; but what sort of governments? Provisional governments, subordinate to the military. They were not legal, because they were not organized according to law, not absolutely null and void; governments de facto, if you please, provisional, existing by sufferance, subject at all times to the paramount authority of the military established by this act.

The first section of the act then proceeds to declare—

"That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts, and made subject to the military authority of the United States."

Is the government of the State of Ohio subject to the military authority of the United States, or are any of the States which have regularly organized State governments?

The second section declares—

"That it shall be the duty of the President"—

To do what?—

"to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district which he is assigned."

What was his authority? His authority was to exercise command over the district. What were his duties?

"It shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals."

Now, sir, there is embraced the whole object of government. Of what else does government consist, or for what other purpose are governments instituted except to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to preserve the peace, and to punish criminals? This whole power is conferred upon the military commanders. But, says the Attorney General, that is qualified, and how?

"And to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose."

He insists that this clause allowing, by the permission of the commander, the local tribunals to try offenders for crimes, limits the whole power conferred by the previous clauses of the section on the commander. Why, sir, suppose the section had read, as it does, conferring all the powers of government on the commander, and then had said that to this end, to enable him to discharge his duty in reference to criminals, he may make use of the jails and penitentiaries in any of the southern States; would that have limited him simply to making use of the jails and penitentiaries and taken from him all the other granted powers? To allow civil tribunals to take cognizance of criminal offenses is but part of the power conferred upon commanders; and this is the more apparent from the concluding sentence of the section, which says:

"And all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void."

For what was the military authority to be exercised? To protect all persons in their rights of person and property; and these States were declared by the act subject to military authority. It seems to me that the construction put by the Attorney General upon this act is as clearly at war with the terms of the act, as we all know it to be with the intention of its framers. If he had assumed that the act was unconstitutional, as the President did, then he might have said it was of no effect; but knowing it had passed over the objections of the President, to undertake to construe it away stultifies the President for having vetoed it and himself as the President's legal adviser, does violence to the terms of the act itself, and to the manifest intent of Congress. He forgets, in construing this act, the object which Congress had in view in passing it. He forgets that in the opinion of Congress the civil governments which had been inaugurated were not legal governments. He forgets that in the opinion of Congress these governments were disloyal, and not fit to be recognized as State governments. He forgets the sentence that declares they shall be subject to the military authority, and seeks by a strained construction to avoid the effect of a very plain statute passed for the very purpose of dispensing with these irregular civil governments which had been inaugurated without legal authority.

The first section of the bill which the committee have reported is intended to carry out what we believe to have been the true meaning of the act as originally passed, and it does nothing more than to declare that fact:

That the true intent and meaning of the "act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, A. D. 1867, was, is, and shall be construed to be that the military authority of the United States in said rebel States, as provided in said act, was and is paramount to any civil government existing therein, makes all such civil governments subordinate to such military authority, and prohibits them from interfering in any way with the exercise of such military authority.

This is a section declaratory of what the law is, an unnecessary section in my judgment, because I think that was the meaning of the law before; but we have endeavored to put it in language so plain that the Attorney General cannot misunderstand it. However, lest by construction it should be again misunderstood, the second section is added, which in direct terms declares—

That the commander of any district named in said act shall have power, subject to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said act shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from, or granted by, or claimed under, any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof; and upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the approval of the General aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army to perform the same.

In the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary it was thought more advisable to confine the power of the military officer when he removed any civil officer in his district to the supplying of his place by the detail of one of his own officers or soldiers. While these States are under military control, so far as the appointment of officers to discharge duties is concerned, there would seem to be a propriety in the appointment being limited to persons already in the service, and who are subject to the Rules and Articles of War. Hence, instead of providing that the commanding officer of the district, when he thinks proper to remove any of the persons exercising civil authority in his district, shall appoint another civilian outside of the Army in his place, the bill, after giving the power to remove, confines the district commander to the detail of some officer or soldier under his command to discharge the duties of the person removed. As this is a very high exercise of power on the part of these district commanders it can only be exercised by the approval of the General of the Army; and section three vests this same power of removal and detail in the General of the Army alone, if he thinks proper to exercise it, but it does not give him power to remove the district commanders. Whether the President of the United States, after having detailed them for the performance of these specific duties, might remove them or not is another question; but that power is not conferred on the General of the Army.

The fourth section merely confirms what the district commanders have already done in the removal and appointment of civil officers.

Section five relates to the registration of voters. That section is made necessary also in consequence of the construction which was put upon the supplementary act by the Attorney General. He held in a very elaborate opinion, which I have before me, that the oath required by the act was conclusive; that any person who took the prescribed oath must be entered upon the registry and was entitled to vote. This is what the Attorney General says on that subject:

"1. The oath prescribed in the supplemental act defines all the qualifications required, and every person who can take that oath is entitled to have his name entered upon the list of voters."

Now, Mr. President, let us see if that is so. What are the qualifications required? The commanding general in each district is required to make a registration—

"Of the male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid."

Who are qualified to vote by the act aforesaid? Those mentioned in the fifth section of the previous act, as follows:

"The male citizens of said State twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election, except such as may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law."

Then the supplemental act goes on:

"And who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath."

Which is as follows:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of _____, that I have resided in said State for _____ months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of _____, or the parish of _____, in said State, (as the case may be); that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do. So help me God."

Now, the Attorney General holds that any person who takes that oath is entitled to vote. This is his language:

"But when we look to the qualifications required of the applicant by the original act, and find that he is required by this oath to swear to every one of these qualifications, and that no authority is anywhere given to enter upon any other inquiry as to his qualifications, or to administer any other oath to him, or any oath to any other person touching his qualifications, and that his oath, and his oath alone, is punished with perjury, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the oath itself is the sole and only test of the qualification of the applicant. When, therefore, a person applies to the board for registration, the power of the board is confined to the administration of the prescribed oath, and if the applicant takes that, his name must go upon the registry."

There never was a greater perversion of a statute than this. I will not take up time but to point out a single one. I know not whether the Attorney General is the advocate of female suffrage. Perhaps he may be. At any rate, here is a greater stride in that direction than has ever been made by you, Mr. President, or any of the members of this body who have advocated female suffrage. The Attorney General has decided that all persons who can take this oath are entitled to have their names put on the registry and to vote, and the registration officers cannot ask any questions. The law confines the right of registration and voting to "male citizens," but the oath does not require the person taking it to swear to the sex.

Females could take it as well as males. Did the Attorney General mean that by so doing females have a right to be registered and to vote?

A female is a person, and the language of the Attorney General is that "any person" who can take this oath is entitled to vote. Now, is it not manifest that the Attorney General is mistaken when he says that all the qualifications required are in the oath? Under his decision the distinction between males and females is lost sight of, while the statute makes that distinction both in the original and supplementary acts. Nothing could be clearer than that the acts of Congress do not authorize the construction which the Attorney General has placed upon them. To avoid future misapprehension, however, the committee have reported a section declaring in express terms that the oath required by the act shall not be conclusive, and conferring on the boards of registration authority to examine witnesses and decide whether a person is entitled to be registered or not.

This relieves that portion of the statute from the difficulty which grew out of this misconception of the Attorney General.

The sixth section which we have reported, also corrects another misapprehension of the Attorney General in regard to the clauses of the oath which disqualify persons who have held executive or judicial offices in a State and afterward engaged in rebellion. The Attorney General says:

"Two elements must concur in order to disqualify a person under these clauses: First, the office and official oath to support the Constitution of the United States; second, engaging afterward in rebellion. Both must exist to work disqualification, and must happen in the order of time mentioned.

A person who has held an office and taken the oath to support the Federal Constitution and has not afterward engaged in rebellion, is not disqualified. So, too, a person who has engaged in rebellion, but has not theretofore held an office and taken that oath, is not disqualified."

Now, sir, that is not a true construction of the act. The act declares that the person applying to be registered shall swear among other things:

"That I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof."

You will observe that nothing is said in this clause about the officer having taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. In another part of the prescribed oath it is declared that he shall swear that he has "never taken an oath," &c.

The clause which requires that the party shall swear that he has not held any executive or judicial office in a State and afterward gone into rebellion, and leaves out the requirement that he must also have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, was inserted for this reason as I recollect: it was suggested by some one that in some of the rebel States for a number of years anterior to the rebellion it had been a custom not to administer the oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States to executive and judicial officers. I think it was said that that was the case in Virginia, whether truly or not I do not know; but that suggestion having been made, this clause was inserted in the required oath to meet precisely that class of persons; so that all legislative, executive, and judicial officers of any State who subsequently went into rebellion are disfranchised by the act, whether they took the oath or not. That is not so; I grant you, in regard to some other officers. When you come to another clause of the oath, it is provided that the applicant shall swear: that he has "never taken an oath as a member of Congress," &c.

It will be observed that there is a repetition of one clause of the oath, and it occurred, I suppose, in the way I have suggested. In the first instance the applicant was required to swear that he had not held an executive or judicial office and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; but on a suggestion that there were persons who had held executive and judicial offices in some of the rebel States who had not taken the oath, the other clause was inserted so as to reach their case.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was stated in regard to Virginia, but it turned out to be untrue afterward.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It may be so; but still that was a part of the oath, and the construction of the Attorney General that an executive or judicial officer of a State must have taken an oath to support the Constitution in order to disfranchise him is therefore erroneous as the law stands. The sixth section corrects this misconception. It declares—

"That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary act is (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote."

There has been great practical difficulty in determining what officers were included under the designation "executive or judicial office" in a State. The Attorney General has given a construction to these words, which, substantially, I think is correct; but it is impossible to designate by name the various officers embraced by the words used, because the same officer by name is not vested with the same powers in the different States. To illustrate: in some of the States a mayor of a city is manifestly an executive or judicial officer of the State, because he performs executive and judicial functions under the general laws of the State. That is so in reference to the mayors in some of the cities in Illinois. In other States, I understand, there may be mayors of towns who have no judicial functions, and who perhaps do not come within the definition "executive or judicial officer of a State." The Attorney General construes these words to extend to county officers, but he excludes officers of municipal corporations. In that I think he may in some instances be in error. He also excludes commissioners to lay out roads and of public works, examiners of banks, visitors of State institutions, and the like, all of whom may or may not be executive officers of a State, depending upon the powers with which they are vested. In order to give the best definition we could to that term we have used this language:

"And the words 'executive or judicial office in any State' in said oath mentioned shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of the general laws of a State"— leaving it to the boards of registration to determine upon the facts before them whether a person claiming to be registered comes within the definition.

The seventh section extends the time for completing the registration, and also gives power to revise the registration lists twenty days before any election. The reasons for this are these: in some of the districts no registration has yet commenced, and we were informed by one of the district commanders that it would be impossible to finish the registration in his district by the 1st of September. We have therefore inserted this clause extending the time of registration in the discretion of the district commander until the 1st of October. We have also inserted a provision for revising the registration lists, and for this reason: a person to be registered must swear that he is twenty-one years of age. The registration may take place some considerable period before even the first election under the act, and it will be borne in mind that the constitution when framed by the convention is to be submitted for approval or disapproval to the registered voters, which may not be for even a year or more after the registration is finished. In the mean time many persons will have arrived at the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. HOWARD. They would have the right to vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; the oath as drawn by my friend from Michigan himself requires the person taking it to swear "that I am twenty-one years old." He is obliged to take that oath. That being so, it seemed to the committee unjust to deprive of the privilege of voting upon the fundamental law those who become of age between the time of registration and the time of submitting the constitution for ratification. There is also another class of persons to be affected by the final closing of the registration by October. These States are filling up with emigrants. Many persons are moving into them from the northern States. I hope more will go, and that they will be developed and improved rapidly. Now, sir, while this process of reconstruction is going on, which may take six months or a year or two years, is it right that all these persons who shall go into these States, and who may not have been residents when the first registration takes place, and who may have resided there more than twelve months at the time when the constitution is submitted for ratification should be deprived of a voice in passing upon that constitution? The committee thought not, and hence inserted this provision authorizing the registry board to revise their list for three days commencing twenty days preceding any election to be held under these acts.

The eighth section is perhaps unnecessary, but for greater certainty was inserted. It is manifest that these boards of registration are subject to changes by time. Some of the first persons appointed may die; others may resign, move away, or ought to be removed. Hence, although perhaps the power exists now under the original act, it was deemed advisable to confer on the commanding general express authority to remove any one or more members of the board of registration, and also to fill vacancies as they occur.

This is the whole bill as the committee have recommended it to the Senate. I regret that there is a necessity for any such additional legislation. I had hoped that the reconstruction measures would prove a success, and was more than gratified at the spirit in which they seemed to be received in the South. I regret as much as any one to see this military control continued in the country. I want to get back to civil rule, when all the States shall take part in the government of the United States. I had hoped from the evidences we had that during the session of Congress commencing in December next we should have returns from all these rebel States that they had organized governments in accordance with these reconstruction laws, and had sent us loyal men to represent them in these Halls. Such, I believe, would have been the case but for the unfortunate, and, as I think, incorrect opinion of the Attorney General, giving to these acts a construction never contemplated by their authors.

Now, sir, when we shall have removed out of the way the obstructions created by that opinion, I hope that the work of reconstruction may go on; and I can say for one that I earnestly desire these rebel States to be restored to their former relations in the Union. I long to see them in loyal hands and represented here by loyal men. The good of the country requires it; its material interests require it; and as soon as they can organize governments in accordance with these laws, this military control so much complained of will be dispensed with, as I trust, forever. I would hasten the day. But, sir, till loyal civil governments are established the military control is a necessity.

I know complaints are made that there is no warrant for this in the Constitution. I am as much an admirer of the Constitution as any one. I believe in liberty regulated by law. I believe the Constitution confers upon this Government all the powers necessary to be exercised for its preservation, and that it confers no power more clearly than that to make war, put down insurrection and rebellion, and govern rebels who have destroyed all civil authority in a State, through the military power, until sufficient time shall be given to reestablish a civil government loyal to the Union; and I believe it is for the Congress of the United States to determine when such a government is reestablished. I hope, sir, the time when it may properly so determine for each of the rebel States may not be long.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is a matter of some surprise and no little regret to me that the Committee on the Judiciary have reported the second section of this bill. I had hoped that when we came together we would do what we ought to have done a long while ago—vacate the offices in these rebel States. I think the great mistake of the President was in allowing the offices in these States to pass into the hands of disloyal men. The effects have been most disastrous to the country. These men have exercised civil powers in those States, and their moral influence, as well as their official influence, has been against the policy of the Government of the United States and against the friends of the Government and the friends of liberty in those rebel States. These men are not only exercising civil powers and wielding the vast patronage and using the influence growing from the exercise of those powers, but their moral and social influences are very great. The result is that men who are opposed to the policy of the country are in possession of the governments, and the men who are advocating the unity of the country, liberty and justice, and the policy of the nation, are under the ban, political and social.

Sir, when the original military bill was under consideration, I moved an amendment to vacate these offices in ninety days, and I have had reason since to see that we made a great mistake in not doing it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to ask the Senator in that connection a question, with his permission.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is whether the Senator in his amendment did not also expressly confer authority upon these military commanders to enforce the removal of those civil officers in the southern country?

Mr. WILSON. I did so. I was in favor of their removal then, and I have not seen a loyal man and friend of the country in the rebel States who was not in favor of that policy.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Such being the case, I desire to ask the Senator upon what ground he places that construction of the law which we have heard, that the acts in question have already conferred upon those officers that very power of removal?

Mr. WILSON. I am not discussing that legal question, but I will say that the rejection of my proposition requiring that all these offices should be vacated at the end of ninety days, and that the military commanders should enforce the provision, does not deny the power to remove. I have never seen one of the friends of the reconstruction policy of the Government in those rebel States who was not in favor of vacating those offices, and who did not feel that we failed to do our whole duty in not vacating these offices. They complain that the laws are often administered against them unjustly and unfairly, often not administered at all; that life and liberty are often unsafe in the administration of the courts and of the officers of the State governments, and that the whole power of those State officials is against loyal men, the friends of the country. I believe that the friends of this reconstruction policy in these ten States would be from fifty to a hundred thousand stronger to-day if we had vacated these offices and thus destroyed the official and political influence of the men who filled them.

The Senator from Illinois tells us that these States passed into the hands of disloyal men; that if they had passed into the hands of loyal men in all probability the difficulties would have been settled and these States would have been represented in both Houses of Congress. I have no doubt of that. But the fact is, these States passed into the hands of the men who supported the confederacy, and who were hostile to the Government of the United States; ninety-nine out of a hundred of all these officials were disloyal men. Many of them are behaving well now. I give them all credit for it. I would be willing to reappoint many of those men and continue them in office; but the masses of these officers are disloyal, especially in some States, the State of Texas for instance, a State that was not injured a great deal by the war, where they have had an immense immigration, where the bushwhackers of other States have thronged during the last two or three years. In that State the influence of these officers is most-disastrous to the policy of reconstruction.

We have the power, there can be no doubt about that, according to the principles of this bill, we have the power to vacate these offices. The bill of the House of Representatives proposes to allow the military commanders to vacate any of the offices and it authorizes them to fill the offices. We in this bill sanction what has been done in removing and appointing officers; and if we have the power to do that, we have the right to authorize these commanders to remove them all and to fill the vacancies. Now, I say to the gentlemen of the committee they have made this mistake; they have discriminated in this proposition against the loyal men of the South. They will not trust the district commanders there, four of whom have behaved in a manner that has received the applause of the House of Representatives.

I say to the Senate that we have not Army officers in these States to detail to fill any vacancies. I state it as a fact that in many parts of the South the War Department has been pressed to get the number of officers necessary to do the military duty and the number detailed for the bureau. We have no officers to detail for this purpose; and, sir, if we had, would it be proper to detail officers of the Army for these purposes? Suppose General Sheridan shall feel it to be his duty—and I think it is a duty he does owe to the country if he has the power—to remove the Governor of Texas, why should a military man be appointed to fill that vacancy? Why should not a man like General Davis, or Judge Bell, or ex-Governor Pease, or some one of the very able men of that State be appointed? There is hardly a State, certainly there is no disloyal State, where the friends of the Government have so many eminent men as in the State of Texas, many of whom are able, are statesmen, men who would adorn positions of the Government. Why should not one of those men be selected? Why should an Army officer be selected to fill that place? Why should not the true and tried men, who have been faithful to their country amid the trials of the last six years, who are on the spot, who know the laws, who know the people, be selected to fill any vacancies that may be made?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator indulge me with a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the Senator to say that there was no doubt of the power under such an amendment as he proposes to have civil officers appointed in these States by the military commanders. I should like to ask him, first, whence he derives that power, what its source is; and in the second place, what would be the nature of the offices held by these appointees; whether they would hold State offices, after they were appointed, or Federal offices?

Mr. WILSON. I understand that these States have been in rebellion; that they are States, but have no legal State governments; that is, that the present State governments are merely provisional; that we have the power to fill the offices in any way we choose to fill them; that we put these States under military law, military authority, subject to military commanders; that we may by law vacate all these offices, and not fill them, or we may vacate them and fill them in any way we choose. We may detail officers of the Army, or we may appoint civilians. We may authorize the military commanders to vacate offices and appoint to offices, or we may provide any other way to remove and appoint. If a person is appointed Governor of South Carolina, for instance, he is Governor of South Carolina, and should take the oath of office, and should administer the government of that State, and exercise its general duties, subject, however, to the control of the military commander of that department. I do not believe there is any doubt whatever that we have the power to declare these offices vacated, and to authorize the military commanders to reappoint such of the officers as they choose, or to appoint new men. If we have the power, in my judgment, it is a duty we owe the true men of that section of the country that they shall no longer be under officers who are disloyal to this Government, but that these offices shall be filled by men who are in sympathy with the country, men who will use their political influence in favor of the policy of reconstruction, men who will use their social, political, and moral influence and the patronage of those governments, whatever it may be, so as to strengthen the friends of the country and weaken the enemies of the country.

I know that this is the sentiment of our friends through the country. I have had an opportunity to consult with many of them and everywhere that I have met these men, they have said to me, "This military bill has worked admirably; it has generally brought peace, order, protection." I was told in South Carolina that for weeks after the passage of the bill there had not been reported the murder of a single freedman, whereas before murders were frequently reported. These military bills have gone in their influences beyond the expectation of any of us here. We builded better than we knew. We carried power there, and that people know what power means; and what was more potent even than the 20,000 men we sent there armed with power, we put the ballot in the hands of 600,000 black men. Everybody there began to tell the black men that they were born with them, played with them in childhood, ate with them, fished with them, hunted with them, did everything with them; that they were their special friends; that they in reality had by the rebellion procured their emancipation; that they were entitled to the credit of emancipating them; that they deserved their confidence; that the Government of the United States did not intend to emancipate them; and the Crittenden resolution has been dinned into the ears of every black man in the South. These men here tried to make the colored people believe that they were their special guardians and friends; but they could not do it—they remembered Abraham Lincoln. I say the operations of these bills have been of incalculable good, but our friends say, and they have a right to say, that we ought to have vacated the offices, retaining such of the officers as were honestly striving to build up the country and restore the Government, and put the friends of the country into those places; that it would strengthen us everywhere, and it would make it certain that all these States would reconstruct, and not only reconstruct, but be reconstructed by men who would take the governments of those States and maintain the policy of our Government faithfully and honestly.

It is not only important that these States shall come back at the earliest period according to the terms and conditions we have proposed, but it is important that they shall continue to maintain the unity of the country and the liberties and equal rights of all men in the country; that these States shall permanently pass into the hands of men who are in favor of the education of the whole people, of developing the moral, intellectual, and physical power of the people of those States. I put it to Senators here, and I ask, how is it that these fifteen thousand rebels in office in these ten States are entitled to our forbearance or to our sympathy? We do not owe them anything. I would turn most of them out of office to-day, if I had the power, and I would put the friends of the country in their places.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the only true way.

Mr. WILSON. Who deserve our sympathy and confidence, these men who were against us, against the unity of the country, against liberty and justice, or the true and tried men who have stood up for us and fought the battles of the country and have sustained the policy of the freedom of the country? I have been told that the Union men were not fit to fill the offices of the Government or to take control of those States. There is not a word of truth in it, I do not care who utters it.

Mr. HOWARD. Who tells you so?

Mr. WILSON. I believe we have had intimations from the Departments that they had to appoint rebels because they could not find loyal men there fit for the offices.

Mr. SUMNER. That was the official reply to our resolution.

Mr. WILSON. We may not have the old politicians who have governed these States, but we have friends there, tried, true, faithful, sensible, practical men, men who knew enough to be true to their country in times of war and trial, and who know enough to administer the governments of those States. There are a great many repentant men there, men who have been compromised by this rebellion, but who see the folly of the past, and who are ready to unite in the future with us. I am for a liberal policy toward them. But, sir, I do think, while we have the opportunity now, we should so frame this bill that these offices shall be vacated, and we should authorize the military commanders to reappoint such of these men as in their judgment they believe worthy, according to their discretion, or to appoint new men to their offices, and that the men to be appointed should be persons who live in the States, who live in the neighborhood where the duties are to be performed. We should not detail Army officers to be councilmen and aldermen of cities. The military commander has removed some men holding those positions in Mobile. We have not had their places filled yet. We have indorsed that action. Do we mean that General Pope shall detail Army officers to go into the Common Council and the Board of Aldermen of the city of Mobile?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not?

Mr. WILSON. I think it is a very improper place for them to go, and I do not see why Mayor Horton, a loyal man, who has been made mayor of that city, a brother of Rev. Mr. Horton, who was murdered in the New Orleans massacre, should not be sustained by the men who are in sympathy with him in that city. I have met some of these men, and I know they are worthy. I say we have not the military officers to be detailed for any of these offices; if you will go to the War Department you will find that they are pressed for the necessary number of officers in these States at the present time. There is a pressing demand for officers with their troops at this time.

Mr. GRIMES. There are plenty of them in this city.

Mr. WILSON. There are some who have been here some time doing nothing.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not send them away?

Mr. WILSON. I refer the Senator to the President for an answer to that question.

Now, sir, I propose to strike out the second section of the bill, and to insert in lieu of it the following:

That all offices held under the pretended authority of any of the rebel State governments of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and Florida be, and the same are hereby, declared to be vacated at the expiration of thirty days from the passage of this act; and the commanding generals of the several military districts established by the acts to which this is in addition shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to continue in office any person who, before the expiration of the said thirty days, may have been discharging the duties of such office, or the said commanding generals may respectively, in their discretion, appoint other persons to perform the duties of any of the said offices.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise, not to continue general debate, but to assign my reason for making the inquiry I did of the Senator from Massachusetts. He says the only true way is to vacate all the offices in the rebel States, and then depute the military commanders to fill them up; and his distinguished colleague behind him, in his seat, ejaculates that this is the only true way. I will not say it is not the only true way; but I will state some reasons which led me to think the way proposed by the committee might be the more prudent.

Nobody doubts, nobody did doubt, I suppose, before the California case went to the court, that a military commander had authority to direct any person in the military service subject to his order, to go to the right or to the left and perform a duty assigned him. Accordingly it followed, and was accepted by the country and the court, that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army might detail a military officer to go to a certain district, and there perform those functions in description of which he was called a military governor. Nobody now doubts the authority of one of these district commanders, without special act authorizing him to do so, to direct any person in the military service and under his control to perform a function which, all the circumstances considered, falls within the purview of the duties with which the commanders are charged.

But it is said, and the difference in the propositions is manifest, that a military commander may not only detail a person subject to his order to do a given thing, but that he may appoint a person in no wise subject to his order, a person holding no relationship direct or constructive with him, to do a certain act. That introduces a new element. But the proposition goes further, and it is that this same military commander having appointed the person supposed, not in the military service at all, may invest him with official authority and character; that by the ipse dixit of a military commander a person in no wise subject to his order may be in a moment transformed into a public officer. Those who doubt the soundness of this position may perhaps derive their doubts in this way: they may say this officer, thus to be created by the magic of a word, when brought into existence is to be either a State officer or a Federal officer. He is to be the incumbent of a place held by a tenure proceeding from the Federal Government—

Mr. SUMNER. The national Government.

Mr. CONKLING. The national Government. The Senator corrects me. A tenure derived from the national Government, or else from the government of a State. Now, I am not sure which of these alternatives would be the most productive of difficulty in the logic of the case. If he be a Federal—I beg the Senator's pardon a national—officer when he is appointed—

Mr. JOHNSON. The Constitution speaks of the "Federal" Government.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, sir, I would rather now quarrel with the Constitution than with the Senator from Massachusetts, because the Constitution cannot strike back here, and the Senator can. [Laughter.] If this be a national office as is said on one side, or a Federal office as is insisted on the other, there may be some twinges of legal conscience, some obstructions of judgment, some tender-footed hesitations resulting from this provision of the Constitution speaking of the powers of the President:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but"—

And here are the officers otherwise provided for—

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Mr. JOHNSON. And there stops.

Mr. CONKLING. There it stops. That is the mete and bound. There may be those who would think that the commander of one of these departments is not aptly described by either of these words; and that, in view of this provision of the Constitution, it would be a laborious process effectually to clothe him with the power delegated exclusively to other ministers of the Government.

Suppose, on the contrary, these places be deemed State places, offices held under State authority; then I might almost say that the whole genius of our Government denies the supposition that they can be derived from the order of a military commander. Suppose, however, they could spring from the order of an officer of the Army; and I turn now to the argument of expediency and utility, presented by the Senator from Massachusetts; suppose they are State officers; suppose their appointment consummate, and their existence unquestioned when they have been created by a military power—then what? Have they any relations which are sure to be useful or valuable to the Government of the United States? On the contrary, when you assume that hypothesis, do you not encounter the doctrine laid down in various cases by the court, that State officers are mere amateurs, mere volunteers, with regard to any functions imposed upon them or required of them by national or by Federal law. That was decided long ago, first in the case of a justice of the peace in reference to the fugitive slave law of 1798.

Mr. JOHNSON. The case of Prigg vs. Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; the case of Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, and has been recognized repeatedly in other cases. Now, how far it may be necessary to employ these State officers, if such they would be, as adjuncts or auxiliaries of the military, and so of the national authority, no man can tell or foretell; and as the Senator before me [Mr. GRIMES] suggests, in continuation of the argument, to whom are they to be responsible? Suppose they neglect or violate the duties which pertain to them as State officers, the obligatory duties, suppose they do not obey the laws mandatory upon them, saying nothing about those laws which they have the option to execute or not as they please: to whom, for this non-feasance or malfeasance, are they to be held answerable?

I am not expressing any opinion of my own about this, one way or the other. It is not necessary to do so. I merely suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts and to his distinguished colleague, whom I understood to indorse his amendment, that his view is not without difficulty. It may be "a consummation devoutly to be wished," but there are impediments in its way; and he rushes to a conclusion, who simply reasons that because such a mode of supplying officers would be desirable, therefore it should be adopted, and who asserts without argument that the power is free from all doubt. I take it in statesmanship, as perhaps in all the business of life, it is a maxim as universally true as any truth can be universal, that it is a mistake always unnecessarily to assume a position requiring from the outset explanation or defense. Can any Senator say that such a proposition as the Senator from Massachusetts offers would not require explanation and defense wherever it was called in question? It must have been the judgment of the Judiciary Committee—I think I may say it was the judgment of the Judiciary Committee—that such a position was questionable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. More than that.

Mr. CONKLING. One member of the committee says "more than that." I do not mean to speak for anybody specially. I have no right to do so; but certainly the committee must have thought it at least questionable to do this; and so, keeping within the old power, which, as I said in the commencement, we all knew had been accepted, we thought it better that details should be made under that power which enables a military man to say to this man "go," and he goeth, and to another, ex-cute this order, and he executes it. Perhaps the committee trusted to their knowledge, I should have trusted, if I had been reminded of it, to my knowledge, of the presence, not only in this city, but out of this city, of many men in the military service, scattered and collected, from among whom, if not from among those already on the spot, there could be selected to do acts of civil government as many as any exigency is likely to call for during the time to elapse between the passage of this bill and the consummation of that restoration which it seeks.

I do not know what may be the number, no man knows what may be the number, of officers whom the execution of this bill may require to be displaced; but certainly the great majority of them must be officers whose functions are in their nature so simple that they can be discharged by men as intelligent as those who compose the American Army. For those which require a higher standard of intelligence, there are officers. I think it cannot be that there are not enough for all these purposes. But if there be an inconvenience, it is an incident to be borne with. I submit it is no reason for imperiling the construction or existence of a great plan of organization which has been once obstructed, which has been once partially paralyzed by an opinion, whose author perhaps may reconcile it with professional integrity and professional consistency. It should be a weighty argument, indeed, to induce us without positive necessity to encumber this scheme of restoration with anything in the least equivocal, with anything upon which even a hostile Attorney General can hang a doubt.

I said something, Mr. President, suggestive of a doubt whether the opinions of the Attorney General has lately given may be reconciled with professional and official sincerity and morality, and I should perhaps more fully indicate my meaning. Rumor said that the Attorney General wrote that extraordinary veto message which came in here, leveled at the bill of March 2, and afterward the one aimed at the act of March 23. I have no means of knowing whether he did or not; indeed it matters little whether he did or not. Because at that time he sat in cabinet as the law officer of the administration; he sat with an official oath resting upon him, his special duty being to advise his chief upon the law by which he was to be governed. Thus sitting, thus specially charged with responsibility, he voted for these vetoes and approved the messages by which they were explained. I have taken the pains to read them again since this session began. They proceed largely upon the idea that the acts they denounce contain the very ingredients, that they are odious and vicious because they contain the very ingredients, which are now found wanting by the Attorney General.

The vetoes find them replete with remorseless, unmeasured, absolute military power to do everything the will of the commander can suggest; the opinion finds them destitute of many of the most matter-of-course and indispensable elements of effectiveness.

The Attorney General now finds in each act that vacuum which legislation abhors; but when he voted for the vetoes he found overmuch of that lawless, despotic, untamed power by which half a continent was to be reduced to abject submission; by which society was to be disorganized; by which human rights were to be trodden down, and upon the ruins of constitutional liberty was to be set up a despotism not even tempered by assassination. All this the vetoes in substance say. But we are called here now because the vetoes were false, so false that there are not bones enough in these two acts to give them strength for the emergency for which they were adopted.

However, sir, this is foreign from the purpose for which I rose. I designed only to ask the attention of the Senator on my right [Mr. Wilson] to the fact that there are obstacles to be considered before we can reach the point that he proposes.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that if the doubts suggested by the Senator from New York have any foundation we have no right to act on this subject at all. It is very plain that the committee did not consider these doubts valid, for I find that the fourth section of the bill provides—

That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers and appointing others in their stead are hereby confirmed.

Now, sir, the fact is, General Sheridan removed the Governor of Louisiana and appointed a very excellent gentleman, Mr. Flanders, to exercise the functions of Governor of that State. He was a civilian. He was selected by the commander of that military department and put into the office of Governor of Louisiana; and the committee propose that we shall confirm this act of General Sheridan. If we have a right to confirm the removal of Governor Wells and to confirm the appointment of Mr. Flanders, surely we have a right to say that General Sheridan may remove Governor Throckmorton and appoint anybody else in his place; and if we have a right to say that General Sheridan may remove Governor Throckmorton, we have a right to say that Governor Throckmorton shall vacate the office he now holds by law.

Now, sir, it seems to me the case is this: we conquered these ten States; the States exist, according to the theory of these bills, according to the theory on which we have acted, but the offices of those States were vacant, did not exist. The President, I remember, in one of his earliest public documents, stated that they were without organization, without State officers or State organization. But, sir, we found when we passed these bills that by the action of the President the people or a portion of the people in these States had filled the offices. We declared the President had no right to authorize them to do it; that these States were held under the military power of the Government as conquered States, and that he went beyond his powers in giving those people the right to fill up those offices at all. He gave them the right, and they were filled up by men who supported the rebellion generally. Then we said these State governments are merely provisional governments, and we treated them as provisional governments existing by our will. We had a right to pass an act to simply vacate all these offices, and let those States be governed purely by military commanders; but we thought for the purposes of reconstruction, as a practical fact, it would be better to treat them as provisional governments and allow the persons in these offices to be a part of the machinery that would bring about the restoration, and we continued them in office; and we had a right to continue them in office, I take it. We had a right to say these men may continue in office for our purposes; they may administer the duties according to their constitutions and their laws, subject—how? Subject to our action. They are all under the power of the military commander by our laws; and I believe that if any of these officers obstruct the execution of the laws of the country, thwart the policy of the Government by the use of the powers conferred upon him in his office, or in any way stands as an obstacle to the reconstruction policy of the Government, these commanders, without our leave, by the laws now existing, have a right to remove such a man. They have removed some of these officers, and we come forward and say that we confirm it. Then if we can confirm that, why not say, as the House bill says, if you do not wish to go the length of my amendment, that they may remove any of these officers and appoint civilians?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask him if there is not a difference between what has been done in this bill and what he proposes in every way practically? Suppose it to be true, as he seems to suggest, that some one or all of these commanders have done acts which, although well meant, technically overstepped their authority. Suppose that to be so; I do not say whether it is or not; and in a bill we include a section like this that all their acts are confirmed. Suppose it turns out, as the argument would be, that that section would not perform the office for which it was intended; that it would not indemnify against all possible objections that may be made hereafter. Grant that. That is no reason, it being questionable in the first place, I submit, why such a section as that should not be contained in a bill, because the acts having been done in good faith, there being no dispute about the good intention of the officer, all that legislation can do to cure any possible technical defect that there might be, should be done; but when you come to carry into the whole scope of a bill for the future, provisions of the same kind, the Senator will see that you make the future depend upon the question which arises.

Now, if this section referred to is beyond our constitutional power, it does General Sheridan no good and no harm, and it does the residue of the law no harm; it does the progress of reconstruction no harm; and there may be a question about it. Lawyers will differ. But when you come to make the future operation of the bill hinge upon this which is questionable, then you embark for the future in this boat which is thus frail and doubtful. Now, because the committee saw a question here that did not convince them that they ought not to confirm these acts which had been done in good faith, and, on the contrary, because they put in a section confirming these acts, that does not dissipate all doubt with regard to it, nor lead them to think that it would be quite safe to embark the whole fate of the reconstruction system upon the question which might there arise.

I think the Senator will see—I meant to have answered this when I was up before; I beg his pardon for interrupting him—although there is undoubtedly a theoretical inconsistency in this bill, it is all answered by the fact that the section he refers to is entirely retroactive, and if it fails, it does no harm. The other section which he proposes and the provision which he wants, is entirely prospective, and if it fails the whole scheme attached to it would go down.

Mr. WILSON. I see the distinction made; and still it does seem to me that there cannot be any question in regard to this power. Why do we wish to adopt such a provision? Take the case of Governor Flanders: it is a well known fact that at this very hour a portion of the officers of the State of Louisiana are denying his authority. So in Mobile, Mayor Horton of that city is resisted in the exercise of his duties, thwarted, opposed by a portion of the city officers; and since the Attorney General's opinion some men appointed to office there have declined to accept on account of that opinion. There cannot be any doubt at all that the opinions of the Attorney General have had a very damaging effect on the policy of reconstruction, not only in regard to the sentiments of the people there but in regard to the action of the officers of those States. I understand that in Louisiana a portion of the State officers are undertaking to resist the action of the Governor, and certainly the city officers in New Orleans are resisting the action of the mayor appointed by General Sheridan.

Now we propose to confirm this action of our commanders. If we have the power to confirm it at all, we have the power certainly to adopt the amendment which I propose. I am utterly surprised that anybody in Congress should raise a question as to the power of the Congress of the United States to do what we please in our legislation in the rebel States in regard to the point whether these men shall be in office or not in office. How came they in office? By the action of the President of the United States. We denounced that action as a matter of policy and as a matter of power, and some went so far as to maintain that the President ought to be impeached for that action; and certainly if he ought to be impeached for anything I think he should be impeached for that, because the trouble he has brought upon this country by his premature action in restoring the governments of the rebel States, and by putting the governments of those States into the hands of rebels, no human being can measure. It brought upon the country in many cases outrages and abuses upon loyal men and upon freedmen. Many a man sleeps in his grave to-day on account of it. The thoughtful, conscientious men of this country have gone to their pillows burdened with anxious thoughts for a year and a half on account of this action of the President. I say that the action of the President in putting these States back again into the hands of rebels has burdened the thoughts of men connected with the Government who were anxious for the final settlement of these questions, so as to have a united country and liberty and justice everywhere, perhaps as much as they were burdened during any year and a half of the war. He has made men wretched and unhappy on account of it. We maintained that he acted without authority, that these men were filling their offices without authority. I have no doubt of it. It would have been in our power a year and a half ago, when the Thirty-Ninth Congress met, to vacate all these offices. I thought we ought to do it then. I have thought so from that hour to this. Who is to question our power to do it? Turn them out of their offices, let us say they shall be vacated, and let us give to our military commanders in whom we vest the whole power in these territories, the authority to fill their places; or if we are not satisfied that they alone shall fill them, let us authorize an election to be called to fill them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will allow me to suggest that there is another difficulty besides the one he refers to. The committee did not feel themselves at liberty to depart from the original reconstruction measure. The original bills did not remove from office; and we felt instructed in fact by the resolution adopted by the Senate. Although we might have thought that it would be better to have some different reconstruction measure, we considered ourselves limited in the bill we reported to one removing the obstructions to carrying out the bills as they were originally passed. We thought the resolution of the Senate limited us; and I submit to the Senator if we had best not adhere to the original proposition. If we commence departing from it, and depart from it in one thing, we may then be forced to do so in another.

As I am up let me suggest to the Senator one other consideration. He says that we have declared these governments set up by the President to be illegal, and he thinks we ought to wipe them out of existence. Now, he proposes that we shall recognize them to the extent of recognizing the offices created by them and filling them ourselves. We make use of these officers as a sort of locum tenens; we make use of the existing governments there as far as they can conduce to the work of reconstruction; but it does not follow that although we have the right to sweep them out of existence—

Mr. WILSON. I did not speak of sweeping them out, but of vacating the offices.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not follow because we may vacate the offices that we can confer on some one the power to fill them. I do not say we may not do it; under one view we doubtless have the power; but there is some question about it; and it was thought safer, as it was believed no great inconvenience would arise from it, to authorize the commanding general to do that which nobody would doubt that he had authority to do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the difference between the bill as reported and the amendment suggested is this: we say in the bill that the commanding general may remove any functionary that he sees proper to remove when he deems it necessary; the amendment says that the commanding general may retain any that he sees proper to retain. That is all the difference between the bill and the amendment so far as continuing the officers is concerned. It is a distinction without a difference; for the commanding general can now remove all that he sees proper to remove, and the amendment says that he may retain all that he sees proper to retain. If the amendment is intended as an expression of the opinion of the Senate that it is wise to have a general evacuation of these offices, a general sweep of fifteen thousand officers, I differ from my learned friend as to the policy of that movement. I think it would be a disturbing, revolutionary movement at this crisis at the South which might do great injury; and after the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has told us the result of his visit to the South, and how successfully, without this amendment, without the removal of these officers, this plan for reconstruction is progressing, I almost wonder that he should be willing to run the risk of such a movement and to disturb what is now well enough. It certainly would be a very disturbing movement in society.

Further, it is very clear that these officers, after the passage of the bill now under consideration, will be powerless for all evil; for if there are cases where such persons interfere with reconstruction, where their influence is exerted against it, the military commander has the power at once of removing them. Besides that, the period for which these offices are now filled is very brief, for I take it this is all a mere temporary movement; this reconstruction measure will very soon be voted upon, and these States will be reinstated in the Union and their offices filled by a different constituency under the principle of universal suffrage.

I need add nothing to the able argument of the Senator from New York, but it must be manifest to every one that there would be no harmony in a system which authorized a military government to detail laymen to the discharge of those duties to which they have a right to appoint persons to only by reason of military power.

But the true argument against the amendment is that which was just suggested by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that it is not contained in the original act of reconstruction. The proposition was made by the Senator from Massachusetts that it should be one of the provisions of that act, but it was rejected by the Senate. And now, even if I believed that his measure was wise, I would not give it my vote, for I will not add to what we declared to the South should be a finality. It certainly was not contemplated in those measures that these fifteen thousand officers should all be turned out of office.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the public will say that by the passage of the bill under consideration we have added to the reconstruction measures of the last Congress; and I have carefully, with that view, examined those measures and endeavored to analyze what is contained in them. The whole question between the Attorney General and Congress is this: whether the State governments there existing are or are not subordinate to the military power. He says they are not subordinate to the military power; Congress says they are. That is the issue which has brought us here. Now, for a single minute, I desire the attention of the Senate to show how clear it is that we placed these State governments directly under the power of the military governments which we created.

The first five sections of the act of March 2, 1867, clearly supersede the actual State governments as independent organizations. The preamble expressly declares that no legal State governments exist, and that no adequate protection for life and property exists, and that the reason assigned for passing the act is that it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced until loyal and republican State governments can be established. Taken together, the preamble declares that no legal, no loyal, no republican governments exist, and that there is no adequate protection to life or property, and that it is necessary to make some provision for peace and good order until loyal and republican governments can be established. The preamble is in these words:

"Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal republican State governments can be legally established."

Now, it is a great jump that the Attorney General makes when he comes to the conclusion, in the face of that preamble, that the existing State governments are not only legal governments, but that we established them and made them superior to the very government which we created by the act.

In view of the controversy between the President and Congress, and in the light that the history of the controversy sheds, the act asserts that the governments erected by the President are not legal, and that some other means of protecting life and property, peace and order, are necessary. Then follows in the bill the enactments, all and each of which strengthen and confirm the principal idea of the bill stated in the preamble.

The first section declares that the States shall be divided into five districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States, and the mode and manner is afterward prescribed.

By the second section the President is directed to assign a general officer to the command of each district, with sufficient military force to enable him to perform his duties and enforce his authority, not to enforce the authority of the so-called State governments.

By the third section it is made the duty of the general officer (not the duty of the so-called State governments) "to protect all persons in their rights of person and property." But that duty embraces all domestic governments, and independent of the rights growing out of a State's relations to the Federal Government (and with these States that relation is not yet reestablished.) "Protecting all persons in their rights of person and property" is all of government, and so the act gives the commander entire civil and criminal jurisdiction. The section, further providing for the disordered state of society, directs the commander "to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace." This law only places these States in the condition they were in when recently under military rule before the establishment of the so-called State governments. They are subject to military authority. This same section goes on to show what use might be made of the existing State governments or their tribunals, and provides that "to this end—that is, the protection of the rights of person and property, the preservation of order and the punishment of crime—he (the military commander) may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, he may organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose," and to make it perfectly clear and plain that the military commander is not to be interfered with and that the State governments are not to exercise any functions except by his permission, it is added, "and all interference under color (that is to say, on the pretence of any) of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void." The independent (not the allowed and permissive) exercise of any functions of government by the so-called State governments would of course conflict with the execution by the military commander of his duties and the maintenance of his authority; for it is, from the very nature of government, impossible that two jurisdictions should concurrently "protect all persons in their rights of person and property," suppress disorder and punish crime.

One must exclude the other. The power of universal independent regulation over any subject is necessarily exclusive.

The fourth section contains nothing material to the question under consideration. The fifth section provides that when the people of the rebel States shall have, by delegates elected as directed, framed a constitution and shall have adopted the constitutional amendment, and when their action shall be approved by Congress, that then the rebel States shall have representation in Congress, and the act we are considering shall become inoperative. The idea that these rebel State governments are to continue to exercise independently their functions is by the act excluded and repudiated. The whole enactment is on the very opposite idea.

The supplement of March 23 carries out the same purpose. Its object is, under the direction of the military commanders, to provide for the registry of voters, for taking the votes of the people on the question of having a constitutional convention, on the election of delegates, and on the ratification of the Constitution. This supplement proceeds on the idea that no authority existed in the States to prescribe these regulations, and so Congress prescribed them by this supplement.

It seems to me, so far as the first five sections of the act of March 2, 1867, and so far as the act of March 23 are concerned, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the so-called State governments are subordinate to the military governments thus established.

But the sixth section of the act of March 2, 1867, it is claimed, legalizes these State governments as independent of the military government. In other words, the sixth section undoes and takes back all that the five previous sections has done or given. Such a construction directly violates a familiar principle of construction, to wit, that an act must be construed together, so that it will all stand and harmonize. The sixth section does legalize the State governments; but how? As independent governments? Not at all. As provisional governments? How provisional? Just as is declared in the five previous sections, that is, subject to the military commanders, existing by the permission of the military commanders who are intrusted with the duty of "protecting all persons in their rights of person and property," and who are told that they may allow civil tribunals to try offenders, and who are told by the act that any interference with their military authority under color of State authority is null and void.

In that subordinate provisional condition the State governments are legalized by the act. In all cases where military control of a country is assumed, the civil governments, tribunals, and magistrates are suffered to exist, exercising their usual functions in a permissive, provisional manner, so that the usual forms and sanctions of society may be preserved. When these States were first taken possession of by our military forces the civil governments there were permitted so, and only so, to exist. The sixth section declares what the first five sections all necessarily imply, to wit, that the State governments are provisional. The act further in this sixth section declares that these governments thus made provisional shall in all respects be subject to the paramount authority of the United States, which may abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same. Yes, and these rebel States are by virtue of that very provision subject to what Congress has declared in the five preceding sections of this act, as well as subject to any other future legislative Congress may take.

The whole act harmonizes, and taken together means that a military government is for a time, while reconstruction is going on, established at the South; that the civil government there shall be subordinate, as is always the case, to the military government, and that Congress reserves the right entirely to abolish or to further modify these civil State governments.

This act adds nothing to the original reconstruction act; it only removes doubts which a misunderstanding of it has created. I for one am not in favor of adding to or subtracting from the original reconstruction act one word. If in good faith the South comply with that act in letter and in spirit I will favor their representation here.

I believe that the success of our grand experiment of self-government, securing the results of the recent war, our commercial prosperity, and the reestablishment of that harmony and good feeling which must knit us together as one people, all call for the speedy restoration of the southern States. And as the gentle showers and genial suns of spring do more than the tempests and frosts of winter to restore the verdure of the earth, so that forbearance which is consistent with principle will do more to restore this nation than stern, confiscating, disfranchising justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. HOWE. I do not rise now to say whether I shall vote for or against this amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I rise mainly to say, sir, that whether we adopt or reject the amendment, I humbly conceive we ought to be governed by other considerations than the one urged so forcibly and so eloquently by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If there be good reason why we should not vacate all those local offices existing under those governments which we have declared to be provisional, I am quite sure that the conclusion to which the Senator from Massachusetts arrives, that we have no authority to enact any part of this law, is correct.

Mr. President, this bill does undertake to say that certain military commanders down there may vacate every one of these offices, and may provide for filling them; how? By detailing some subordinate. Where do we get the power to say that? If I understand the Senator from New York aright, he seems to suppose that the power to fill these offices by detail is a power given here in the superior over the subordinate. He has it simply because being the superior officer he can command his subordinate to go to the right or to the left, to do or to refrain from doing what he chooses to order. Now, I think that is a mistake. I think a general has no such authority over his subordinates. I think, to be sure, he can command his subordinate to do whatever lies in the line of military duty, but not to go outside the line of military duty. I am very certain the Senator from New York would not insist that there was authority in a superior officer of the Army of the United States to command a subordinate of his to fill the office of mayor in the city of New York, nor to fill any one of the local offices in the State of New York. And yet the authority of the superior is just as complete in the State of New York as it is in Alabama or in South Carolina, is it not? And if that authority be inherent in an officer of the United States in one portion of the country, it seems to me it must be inherent in him in every portion of the country.

But the Senator supposes that there is another distinction between the authority contained in the bill and the authority invoked in the amendment. He seems to suppose that it is a very different thing for a general to command a colonel to enter on the discharge of the duties pertaining to one of these local and municipal offices and for him to command a citizen in any one of these districts to do the same thing. I concede that there is a difference between the authority of a military officer, generally speaking, over one of his subordinates and his authority over a citizen; but that is not the question here. Is there a difference between the authority of a general to command a citizen to exercise the functions of an office and his authority to command a citizen not to exercise the functions of an office? There was filling the office that we call Governor of Louisiana a citizen of that State, filling it, not in pursuance of his own pleasure or at his own choice, but filling it at the bidding of the whole people of Louisiana, or so many of them as were consulted in reference to that matter, falling short of the whole I admit. The people of Louisiana had commanded him to fill that office. He was a citizen. He was no subordinate of a general, no inferior. The Senator from New York supposes that the authority is very plain in the commanding officer to tell citizen Wells to step out of that office into which he was ordered to enter by the people of Louisiana; that that is the plain exercise of plain military authority; but to tell citizen Flanders to step into that office is the exercise of military, despotic power; in other words, that it is very plain that according to law it is perfectly proper for a military officer to kick a man out of his house, but it is very arbitrary and very despotic and very tyrannical for him to push a man in.

The force of the distinction does not occur to me. Sir, I do think you have the authority to vacate these offices, or you have not; and I think if you have authority to vacate them you have authority to fill them. But gentlemen say the authority of the military officer to do these things has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States; that on a given occasion a military commander did by detail put his subordinates into civil offices and clothe them with the function of discharging civil duties, and the Supreme Court has recognized that, and therefore, inasmuch as subordinate officers were employed on that occasion we had better stand by the precedent.

Mr. President, is it true that the Supreme Court indicated by a single word, by a single letter of the adjudication in that case, that the validity of those acts rested upon the fact that the military commander employed subordinates in the discharge of them? Or was there a word or a letter of that adjudication which indicated that it was the opinion of the Supreme Court that there was any authority of any description inherent in the military commander there, and which transcended the authority of the law-making power of the United States? Why had Colonel Mason the authority to do those things there? Was it because he had authority transcendent, supreme, over the authority of the Congress of the United States; or was it because he was a servant of the United States, and of necessity clothed for the time being with the authority to do specific things because in the interest of the United States, while the law-making power of the United States had refrained from speaking their will on the subject? Necessarily this was their view of it; manifestly this was their view of the subject; because, if I understand their reasoning aright, its whole force rests upon the fact that the United States had not spoken. These commanding officers were there temporarily in the absence of civil functionaries whatever. Order must be maintained; the interests of the United States, the dominant and the conquering power, must be defended. The Legislature had not spoken, and until it did speak the military authority was provisional, and must, upon its official responsibilities, do what it deemed proper, not to suit its own pleasure, but to suit the interest of the Government of the United States. That was the point in the case, and the ground upon which the court stood. Then what did the Legislature do in reference to that very district when they came together and did speak? Did they undertake to perpetuate the authority of Colonel Mason? Did they undertake to continue it a day? Not at all; they proceeded at once to establish civil government. No, I am not right in saying that they proceeded to establish civil government in California. They found a civil government there, if I remember aright, and they displaced the civil functions of Colonel Mason and replaced them with the functions of the civil government they found; but in reference to other portions of the territory conquered in the same war and conquered by the same force they proceeded to do what I have contended from the beginning of this terrible struggle was the first duty resting upon the law-making power of the United States, and that was to provide provisional governments, and civil, not military provisional governments.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts proposes not merely to authorize these military commanders to vacate all these offices, but proposes to authorize him to fill them also, and to fill them, not by detail of his subordinates, but by the appointment of citizens. The Senator from New York suggests that there are grave constitutional objections derived from another quarter against doing this. The Senator from Massachusetts replied to him, as I thought at the time, and I am bound to think still, conclusively, thus: if you have not the authority, if you cannot clothe the military commanders with the power to command a citizen to fill one of these civil offices, upon what ground can you justify the fourth section, because the historical fact remains that one or more of these district commanders has exercised this very authority, and the fact remains that this bill undertakes to say in the fourth section that what they did in that behalf is valid and is confirmed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not say "is valid."

Mr. HOWE. "Is confirmed" without being valid.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not use the word "valid." I merely stated that fact.

Mr. HOWE. I thought they were synonymous, but I find only one of these words is in the section, and the other is not; but I assume for the purpose of this argument that the Judiciary Committee did not mean by an act of Congress to confirm anything which in their judgment was not valid.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That might be done, I suppose. I suppose it is competent to confirm an act which was not valid without the confirmation.

Mr. HOWE. Oh, yes; but not to confirm an act which we could not make valid.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a difference between the two, that is all I mean to say.

Mr. HOWE. What is the reply to that on the part of the Senator from New York? Why, he says the instances in which this power has been exercised are few, are exceptional; it will not do any hurt to undertake to confirm those if you have not the authority to confirm; but it would be a sad mistake to undertake to transfer the power there exercised and here confirmed in terms into the body of the bill; why? Because then the whole bill would be a mistake if the power failed; but if the power fails the fourth section is not of any particular consequence. I submit to the honorable Senator from New York that I think he underestimates the consequences which would result from the enactment of this fourth section even if we found we had no such power. There is the fact. General Sheridan has removed from office the Governor of Louisiana, Mr. Wells; he has put into that very office Mr. Flanders; you, speaking for the law-making power, confirm that act and adjourn, and the Attorney General on some later day in this session, or the Supreme Court, or the American people, conclude, as the Senator from New York seems to argue, that we have not the authority to empower General Sheridan to do any such thing; what follows? There is no Governor there of any kind. Wells is not Governor; Sheridan has removed him. Flanders is not Governor; he had no authority to appoint a Governor. He has made a vacancy; it is not filled. Can it be filled? Let some good lawyer answer me. Can it be filled? There is an office made vacant by the removal of Wells, vacant again by the great and ultimate decision that Flanders was a usurper in it; how shall it be filled? Will General Sheridan detail an officer of his?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who made the office?

Mr. HOWE. Louisiana made the office of Governor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Made that office that Wells filled?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You have decided that that government is illegal.

Mr. HOWE. But I understand that Louisiana made the office; that is the question put to me. I understand that Louisiana made the office; it is made vacant by this act. Can General Sheridan then go on and detail a subordinate of his to fill it, overriding the express letter of your law here? Then he does transcend the declared will of Congress. They say Flanders shall stand the Governor of Louisiana; that is what you are asked to say in this fourth section. You cannot expect your military commander to disregard that and hereafter fill that office by a subordinate. And what I say of this office of Governor in Louisiana is true of every one of the offices in all these communities in which this thing has been done.

But then the Senator cites us to the text of the Constitution. He supposes we may have difficulty arising from the very text of the Constitution. What is it? The Constitution says that the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, such and such officers, and the appointment of those officers who may not be so appointed may by authority of law be given to the President or a member of the Cabinet, or to a court of law; and he rightly concludes, I think, that these military commanders down there are not among the persons upon whom we can vest this authority; and I think the Senator rightly concludes that if these are national offices down there, then we cannot confer this authority to fill them upon a district commander; but if they are not national offices, and I conclude they are not, the Senator concludes that they must be State offices. That I do not see. There is where I differ very broadly, perhaps radically, with the Senator. I think they are not State offices.

Mr. CONKLING. What are they?

Mr. HOWE. Offices existing in a government which we have at last, though years after the time had come at which we should have said so, said are provisional.

Mr. CONKLING. Nevertheless, what are they, State or national?

Mr. HOWE. Neither State nor national, but provisional governments for the control of a portion of the common territory of the United States. They are offices existing under authority of laws enacted by communities, a portion of the people of the United States, and by laws which we never have repealed.

It is said about me that they are agencies as distinguished from offices. I am willing to call them agencies; but what harm is there in calling them offices? There are just such officers as a Governor and judges in the Territory of New Mexico and in the Territory of Utah. They are there for precisely the same reason, though not created in the same way, that such offices may be in South Carolina or in Georgia; they are there because these are a portion of the common territory of the United States, because there is no State government there to displace them or replace them, which our Government, the supreme authority of the nation, will recognize or have recognized. That is why there are these offices in Washington Territory, in New Mexico, and Utah; that is reason enough why they should be in Georgia, in Alabama, and in Mississippi; and I see no more harm in calling them offices in one place than in another. There are functions with which each one of these officers is clothed, essential to the peace and well-being of those communities, functions which are vested by no national law in no national officer whatever; and, therefore, unless we recognize these several functionaries, or some functionaries as having the right to discharge these duties down there, they must fail and cannot be discharged by anybody.

Mr. President, I rose mainly to remonstrate against the attempt to deny the authority of Congress to do what we are invoked to do by the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, because when you have established the fact that we cannot do that, I am as firmly convinced as I am of anything that we cannot do anything which we are asked to do in the bill reported here by the Judiciary Committee. The propriety of adopting this amendment has been disputed on the ground of expediency. I do not propose to discuss that portion of the case except in reference to a particular remark submitted by the Senator from New Jersey, which was to this effect: that if he believed this amendment was a judicious exercise of authority he would not agree to it, because he would not agree to add a line or a letter to what we did during the last session of Congress and during the commencement of the present Congress, and which we had agreed to as a finality.

Now, Mr. President, I simply wish to say, as indicating a point of difference between myself and my honorable friend from New Jersey—and there is upon this floor no Senator with whom I differ more reluctantly—that I never understood, and I am not able now to understand, how anything which was enacted in either of the laws to which he has referred can be pleaded as an estoppel against the Congress of the United States. I do not understand by what right any one can assert that we have ever submitted any act of legislation as a finality to the people of those communities or to the people of the United States. Whatever the national legislature has heretofore said upon this as upon other subjects I understand it has said in the exercise of the ordinary powers of legislation. It has adopted the act as a temporary measure, adopted it because it suited the pleasure of Congress, not by way of negotiation or compact with anybody else, but adopted it to stand while it suited the pleasure of Congress. It is a law, as far as possible from being a contract. We never did, either in the act of March 2 or the subsequent act, pass such a law as estops the Congress of the United States from legislating further in the same direction; and I protest especially against holding either of these acts up to us in the light of a contract, since it must be manifest to-day, if it was not then, that there was but one party to that contract, and that was the Government of the United States. Nobody else assented to it then; nobody else has assented to it yet; and it would be strange if we had exhausted the authority of the Congress of the United States to legislate upon this subject by an enactment which never has been accepted by anybody else. How soon it may be I am sure I do not know. I make this protest, not because, as must have been manifested, I am here a champion of further legislation; not because I am here prepared to say that when these communities have organized State governments in accordance with the direction given in these acts, I shall then insist upon more being done. I am not prepared to say whether I shall be content to invite them in here and seat them in the councils of the nation or not. If I am prepared to do that, I will say now that it will be not so much because of the fact of their assenting to these things as it will be because of the time and the manner in which they assent to them. If they accept them as right and reasonable measures, if those old prejudices which have hung about them shall be discarded, if I see the scales drop from their eyes and see them prepared to recognize not merely the power which enacted these laws, but the righteousness, the essential righteousness of the laws themselves, then I think I shall be glad to hail them here and elsewhere as returned brethren. I am not sure then but that I shall be ready to kill the fatted calf and sit down to a common feast with them. But if they adopt them reluctantly, protestingly, remonstrating against the propriety of the acts, and accepting them as the dictate of power which they cannot resist, then I shall not kill the calf, whatever else I may do.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the argument which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has made upon this subject seems to me to exhaust the question. I have nothing further to say in reference to it. I desire, though, before a vote shall be taken on this amendment, to explain why I cannot vote for it. It is because of the exceeding breadth and scope of it. I do not think that the circumstances of the case require that every civil office in the rebel States should be vacated and filled by military authority. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in the course of his remarks upon it, referred to the number of those offices in those ten States as being probably fifteen thousand. I cannot concur in the expediency of instantly vacating so large a number of offices in those States, extending from the highest office in each State down to the lowest. The views which I had formed before I came to this session have been expressed and laid before the Senate in the bill which I introduced the other day, and which I hoped would be found to contain provisions which would commend themselves to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it seems such has not been the case. In that bill it was provided that the higher offices of those several States should be vacated upon a given day, and be filled by the commanding general, and that the inferior offices should be subject to be vacated by the commanding general whenever he should see proper; and I think that is the wisest course now, for it is those high officers that are working the mischief which the Senator from Massachusetts spoke of in his remarks. It is not the constables and justices of the peace and members of town councils and officers holding inferior positions of that kind that are doing the mischief; it is the high officers, and they should be the ones whose offices should be vacated. If that course should be adopted, a fatal blow would be struck at the influence exerted by the rebel authorities down there against the work of reconstruction, and very little disorganization or trouble would take place in those States; and simply because the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts goes to the extent it does, not because it contains a principle of action which I disapprove, I shall be constrained to vote against it; and if it should not be adopted I shall present to the Senate that proposition contained in the first section of the bill which I introduced the other day, and let us see whether that will meet any better fate at the hands of the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the amendment now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is similar in character to an amendment offered by him and rejected at the last regular session of Congress, when the reconstruction act was under consideration. On the 20th of February the following proceedings took place; I will read them:

"Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer an amendment, but if it is objected to on this side of the Chamber I shall not press it. It is to add to the sixth section of the House amendment the following words:

"And all offices now held under the assumed authority of the rebel State governments shall be vacated within ninety days after the passage of this act; and it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of each military district to enforce this provision."

"The amendment to the amendment was rejected."
"Mr. WILSON. I do not desire to press my amendment against the wishes of our friends on this side; but I believe it is our duty to do what it proposes in some other form and in some other bill, if not on this."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Ninth Congress, Second Session, page 1645.

On a previous occasion that member had addressed the Senate strongly in favor of wiping out these existing State organizations in the southern country and supplying their place in some manner, either by direct congressional legislation or by the action of the military commanders who were to be placed in command of the several districts. It was then throughout the debate upon all sides conceded that those existing State governments were for some purposes valid and effectual institutions. The Senator from Ohio who then sat upon my right, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and whose name was identified with the form which the reconstruction bill assumed in the Senate before it went back to the House of Representatives and was amended there, gave an elaborate statement at my instance of his views in regard to the character and status of those State organizations. He gave at my instance in particular an explanation of the preamble to that bill, which, as it was introduced by himself, he ought certainly to have comprehended. His argument was this: that those State organizations, set up at the instance of the President of the United States by the people, were not legal State governments, as is said in that preamble, for purposes of representation in this government; that they were not State governments within the purview of the Constitution of the United States, and for that reason entitled to demand membership on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House, but that they were governments properly and validly instituted by the people of those several communities for local purposes, and might be regarded in that light, and that it was perfectly competent for those organizations to proceed as they had proceeded before, to take jurisdiction of civil and criminal law, to administer the former systems, both civil and criminal of those States; subject, however, he maintained, to the pleasure of Congress at any time to arrest their action and to subvert them or to limit them in their jurisdiction.

I believe that was the general view entertained or at least expressed by gentlemen of the majority in this Chamber, whose speeches are upon record and can be referred to for the verification of my statement if necessary. In consequence of this general view then announced, then held, as I understood, by most, if not all, of the majority members on this floor, the Senator from Massachusetts, who was not satisfied with the condition of things, who desired to introduce an element of change, as he thought of reform and improvement, presented the amendment which I have read. That amendment looked to the abolition of those governments within a period of ninety days; that the officers who then acted should end the exercise of their functions at the end of three months; and he proposed by his amendment to confer the authority of Congress upon these military commanders to oust them from their offices and to institute a new administration of local affairs.

Now, sir, could there be any fact more decisive against the power of these military commanders under that legislation to remove these officers in authority in the "provisional" governments, as they are described in the law, and to substitute for them appointees of their own? This is only one fact in the history of our proceedings at the last session; it is only one in a series of facts which might be cited in this debate to prove that at that time it was not intended or expected that our five military commanders should assume the imperial power of displacing officers set up by the people of those communities and substituting for them appointees of their own. Besides, by the very law itself it was expressly declared that the Government of the United States reserved to itself complete power and jurisdiction over those State organizations, or "provisional" governments as they were described in the law. It is clear from this that complete power over them was not conferred upon the military commanders.

I say then, sir, that both by the letter of the statute and by the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, including the declarations of members, it appears that there is no ground whatever for pretence of that power which has been recently exercised, and which is alluded to in the first section of the bill reported to us by the committee. Before this debate concludes, and when we reach the consideration of the bill itself as reported by the committee, I intend to enter upon an examination of the enactments of Congress passed at the regular and at the short session, and to show by them that the representations which have been made to the people of the country with reference to the powers which were conferred by these statutes upon these military commanders are misconceived, that they are unfounded in point of fact, and that there has been, in all material respects at least, a fair and reasonable construction assigned to these laws by the Attorney General of the United States, and that in the propositions which are now being introduced into the two Houses we have new matter, and not merely a revision or amplification of the old; that these alleged matters of construction of former laws are really measures in addition to them, in expansion of our system of military government in the South; and that they will confer, if enacted, new, independent, and important powers upon our military commanders in that section.

However, sir, I rose at the present time for the purpose of calling attention to the evidence which our own debates at the last session furnish of the view which was then held by the majority in this Chamber with reference to the position and status of the southern State organizations. I do not desire at this time of the afternoon and on an amendment relating to a single point to enter into the general debate upon this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Nye, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Crain, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to move a mere verbal amendment to the pending bill. In the second and third sections, where "the General of the armies" is spoken of, the last word should be in the singular, so as to read "General of the Army of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I shall propose to-morrow; and if there be no objection I should like to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made the order to print will be entered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the amendment be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to add to the bill as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That in the election of Representatives in Congress from the said States mentioned in the act of 2d March, 1867, each elector shall be entitled to give as many votes as there are Representatives assigned to his State by the apportionment law, and he may give one vote to each of the requisite number of persons to be chosen, or may cumulate his votes and bestow them at his discretion upon one or more candidates less in number than the whole number of members to be chosen from such State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, if there be no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that that bill go on the Calendar and be printed, so that we may have copies of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without a reference?

Several SENATORS. Refer it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the object in referring it?

Mr. JOHNSON. We can report on it tomorrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will involve the necessity of a meeting of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print the bill will be entered, no objection being made.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit to the Senator from Michigan whether it is best to refer it. The subject is now before the Senate. Perhaps it may be thought advisable to amend the House bill in some respects, or substitute ours for it.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I withdraw the motion to refer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it will be better to have it printed and let it lie on the table for the present, so as to keep it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table and be printed. Senate bill No. 131 is now before the body.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the second section of the pending bill by adding after the word "Army" in the eighteenth line the words "or other person," so as to authorize the commanding general to fill vacancies by the detail of some competent officer of the Army or some other person.

Mr. HENDERSON. It would be better to say "by the appointment of some other person." The military commander cannot detail civilians.

Mr. WILSON. I accept the suggestion and modify my amendment by proposing to insert the words "or by the appointment of some other person."

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am sorry to occupy the time of the Senate; but I think it so important that this amendment of my friend from Massachusetts should not be adopted that I beg to trespass for a very few moments upon the patience of the Senate.

I may say in the first place that the subject engaged the most careful consideration of the committee to whom the bill was referred. We were as desirous as any member of the Senate can be to give the largest efficiency to this government which we were endeavoring to carry forward in these States. We were as desirous as my friend from Massachusetts even to protect persons, to encourage liberty and progress, and to advance the reorganization of these States in the true and loyal way. But like most men who have practical objects to accomplish, we felt obliged to adapt to these ends that we had in view means which would be efficacious, means that the laws of the country under which we act and by which we were bound will warrant; and therefore it was that we thought it wise, although there may be some inconveniences in it, not greater perhaps than otherwise, to stand by this provision of a detail for the performance of duties and not for the appointment by a military commander of any civil officer whatever.

Now, mark the distinction, Mr. President. This bill as it now stands proceeds upon the idea that an officer being superseded and set aside on account of his improper conduct in these military districts, we are to provide merely for the performance of the duties that he is incapable of performing, and not for substituting another officer in his place. There is a wide distinction. The man who is to fill an office as the successor of this deposed or removed incumbent must of course fill the office as a legally-appointed person, and an office can only be legally filled by an appointed person according to the methods that the law creating the office recognizes and warrants. I take it that is clear. Now, sir, if we are to give to the commanding officer of one of these districts the power, having set aside an improper person from the performance of those duties, to appoint his successor in office, by what tenure is that successor to hold? If he is a successor in the office, if he is the officer that the nature of the office prescribes and requires, then of course he holds the office according to the tenure that the law has affixed to that office; if he is a judge in South Carolina, for life for aught I know, or for a year, or for whatever period of time the law creating the office fixes, he administers civil government; he is a civil officer, and nothing else.

Now, I do not deny that we have the power—I believe we have it—to establish civil provisional governments there. We have chosen, persistently chosen, I may say, after debate, not to do that, but to tolerate existing governments, good or bad, only to coerce them by military power into the observance of what we consider to be the duties that they owe to their fellow-men and to themselves. Therefore the government which we have deliberately adopted in those regions is a government of the sword; and our Democratic friends on the other side made the most of it in so describing it and rightly describing it in the debates that took place upon the passage of the bills. It is the government of the sword; the just and righteous government of the sword which exists in this state of quasi warfare that still continues following the dispersion of the rebel armies—a fit and proper government until peace shall have time to heal the disrupted condition of society. Therefore, as we have fitly chosen to make it, it is a military government; it is the government of military power derived from the principles of public law, and not from any provision in the Constitution of the United States or from any provision in the constitution of any one of these States over which our arms have once more extended the jurisdiction of our own national strength and power.

Now, if that be the case, as every Senator knows it is the case, then governing by force of the military power it is indispensable that we should govern by the agencies of the military power. It is the Army that governs; and when the Army governs, as we all know, upon principles of public law that no man has yet disputed, the Army must govern by its own agencies and by its own officers or soldiers. The General, the Commander-in-Chief, or whoever directs the Army, cannot go beyond the Army for the appointed agencies of executing the military will. If he does, he violates the very law and the very logic of that state of things.

We all know, Mr. President, that every act we do in connection with this will be the subject of criticism, the subject of fierce denunciation and hostility; not in a body like ours where criticism and hostility are of no special consequence to us, but before public bodies in the United States, where the scales of right and wrong are not so evenly and justly poised as they are here, where the majority for the one side or the other of whichever view you may take of it is not so decided as it is here, and where any unwise and unnecessary departure from the ordinary course of procedure will expose us and our cause to the danger of defeat. Is it wise, then, I appeal to my friend, to invite hostility, to invite criticism, to invite opposition, and to invite overthrow in doubtful sections of the country where these things must be debated before the people, who are the final arbiters, by thrusting into a bill a provision of this doubtful and experimental and in my judgment clearly erroneous character?

It was for these reasons that we felt obliged and thought it wise to adhere to the method of executing our will there that we have provided rather than to undertake to enter upon the exercise of a power which either clearly we had not or which in public debate in the country could be made certainly as manifest to be beyond our authority as within it. It is true that there are obstacles in the way of finding officers enough that you were to turn out all of the persons now performing the duties of office; but these considerations are outweighed by those I have named; and it appears to me that a reasonable and decent regard for that prudence which should characterize public men in entering upon experiments of this kind should lead us to submit to these inconveniences rather than expose ourselves—and when I say "ourselves," I mean the just cause that we maintain—to the hazard of unjust criticism, and attack and possibly overthrow, from venturing upon unnecessary experiments of this character. I am reminded, too, by my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and correctly, that this is the same amendment in substance (although a little something else was coupled with the other) as the one which we have voted upon and rejected by so large a majority.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment. I am in favor of it because the rejection of it would, I think, subject us to the imputation of disfranchising a large portion of our fellow-citizens in the South who are as much entitled to hold office as anybody else. The question of power has nothing whatever to do with the decision of this question. As has been well remarked by the Senator from Massachusetts, we have no authority to pass this bill if we admit that these offices exist, if we admit that there are in each of these States the offices of Governor and secretary of state, circuit judges, &c. If we admit that these offices exist there, then, in the language of the Attorney General, a government having such offices is a government. The whole bill goes upon the assumption that there is no civil government there. This bill says that whatever government is there shall be subordinate to the military power. If we treat these as legal offices, then the Attorney General may, in the veto of the President to this bill, embody the argument of the honorable Senator from New York as a good objection, and a good reason for vetoing the bill; because if these are legal offices, and if we treat them as valid offices, then the clause of the Constitution quoted by him is clear that the President and not Congress shall have the power of appointing persons to hold these offices. But the bill goes upon a different assumption, that these are usurped governments; that they are governments put up in place of the loyal governments which existed before the rebellion commenced.

If I am right in this case, we have a simple duty to perform. These are provisional governments, not legal governments. Somebody has been appointed to perform the duties of the office of Governor. Why? Because he is Governor? No. Congress cannot appoint a Governor. He is appointed simply to perform temporarily the duties of the office of Governor. He is the mere agent of Congress, or at least of the persons appointed by Congress to discharge those duties. Therefore the clause of the Constitution which is relied upon by the honorable Senator from New York is no objection, and can be no objection whatever to the appointment of civilians to discharge the duties of these offices.

Sir, I am for employing the right men to do the right thing. When we wish to do a military act, when we wish to fight battles, when we wish to carry our banner over the field of contest in war, or to do any other military duty I want a military man to do it; but when the duties of civil offices are to be discharged, I want any man who is competent, whether he be a civilian or a military man. All over the South there are loyal men, men who have been true to the Government, civilians of great distinction, men who are fully equal to these duties, as has been stated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I want such men appointed to discharge them. If we treat these positions as offices, as I understand the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to treat them, then the objection of the Senator from New York is good and valid; but we do not so treat them. All our legislation is upon the assumption that there are no offices there according to law; that there is no civil government there until Congress by its sovereign power shall establish civil government.

For this reason I shall vote for this amendment which authorizes the military commanders to appoint men, whether they be civilians or military officers or soldiers, to perform the duties which we style as the offices of Governor and the other offices which have been assumed and which are mere assumptions on the part of those who hold them. They have no right to these offices; they never have acquired that right, and they never will acquire it until Congress has passed a bill which will enable them to hold and exercise the duties of these offices.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the position taken by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] if acted upon by Congress, will plainly say to the country that General Pope in removing the mayor of Mobile and appointing Mr. Horton, and that General Sheridan in removing Governor Wells and appointing Mr. Flanders, and in removing Mayor Monroe and appointing Mr. Heath, acted without authority, exercised a power they did not possess, and a power that we decline to authorize them to exercise hereafter. The Senator says that he shrinks from inviting a contest, that there has been opposition to our military bills, that they have been denounced as arbitrary. I know they have been, and they are stronger than any political organization in this country to-day. There never was so much liberty in those ten States as to-day, never so much protection for life and property. Take all classes of the people there, and they are better protected in life and property under our military bills than they ever were before.

I do not fear any opposition to those bills in any part of our country; but I do desire to encourage men in these ten States who are fighting the battle of unity, liberty, and justice. I want them to feel that we have confidence in them, that if there are places to be filled they are worthy of filling those places. There can be no doubt, there is no doubt, that men who have no sympathy with the acts which we have passed and with the policy of the Government are not only wielding power, but wielding mighty and potent political, moral, and social influence in those States. The truth is that the people of that section of the country have a great respect for power and a great regard for social position; and it has come to pass that rebels are in power basking in the sunshine under the Government of the country, ruling those States, administering law in the courts of justice there, lords of the ascendant, and the Union men, proscribed by the majority, are under their feet, looked down upon with contempt as a second class of men, a class of men that are not fit to administer the governments of those States; and it is a common expression there that the white men who are maintaining and battling for our cause are "mean white men." You hear it said there that the only friends of our policy are the negroes and the mean white men. Now, sir, I say that some of the best men of this country are there, men of principle, of personal character, and of capacity. Most of them are not men who have had experience in public affairs; but, thank God, by the operation of these bills they are to have experience in public affairs in a few months any way; for I believe firmly to-day as I did when we passed the military bills that three fourths of those States will go into the hands of the truly loyal men of the country who support the policy of the Government; and I want so far as I can do it to encourage them, to help them, to strengthen them in the great work in which they are engaged; and I really did not suppose there could be a shadow of question about our power over the subject being full, ample, complete; and the House of Representatives by a vote of 119 to 31, has just passed a bill that contains that provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to hear my friend from Massachusetts resort to such an argument as that in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. What do you mean; the reference to the action of the House?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the House of Representatives by a certain vote have decided that this thing ought to go in and that it is lawful and proper to have it in.

Mr. WILSON. I said they had passed a bill that covered this principle.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; they have passed a bill which covers that principle. My friend entirely evaded going into any discussion of the question of public law and constitutional right that I suggested to him, but has treated us to a dissertation as to the loyalty of certain men down there, and their griefs at not being in office, and their just deserts to have office, all of which I entirely agree to. We did not leave the bill, in reporting it, in this form for the purpose of excluding the friends of the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, down there, from office. We want them to have office. My friend ought to understand it perfectly well. The question, therefore, is not the one that he debated until he told us what the House had voted. I repeat, as I said before, that the Judiciary Committee are as anxious as he can be to strengthen the hands of the loyalists and disarm the hands of the rebels there; but the Judiciary Committee differ from him in their desire to take the most lawful and therefore the most effectual means to accomplish the end. It is perfectly useless in this age of the world for a legislative body to attempt to jump at conclusions. You cannot run a steam engine on moral principles; you are obliged to resort to mechanical and natural laws. You cannot legislate for a military government upon any other principle of public law than those principles that have from time immemorial among all civilized and constitutional governments governed the administration of the military establishment of the country. Does my friend from Massachusetts mean to say—and I want him to listen to me—that if General Sheridan should organize a commission of civilians, or one civilian, to take the place of any judge under our military government in Louisiana, and should try a man and put him in prison, that would be a lawful imprisonment? Was it ever heard of, I will ask my friend, the chairman of the Military Committee, whose reading upon this subject is more extensive than mine, I know; was it ever heard of that a military commission that governs a country or some part of it in time of war or in a time succeeding war was ever organized out of civilians? If so, I should be glad to know it. And if you cannot make up a military commission out of civilians to try and dispose of the rights of persons and property, can your military commander appoint one civilian to do it?

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. What is to prevent the Congress of the United States from authorizing that thing to be done? Where is the higher law that is to prevent these bodies that wield the whole civil and military power of this Government from authorizing that thing to be done?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to have my friend from Missouri ask the question. I have no doubt that he himself is conscious of the proper answer to it; but lest he should not be, or lest it should not be in the minds of some others, I will answer it with pleasure. I wish to inform my friend from Missouri, then, answering the question in the spirit in which he has asked it, as if he really desired to know, and did not know, that whenever we govern by military power the Army of the United States is a constitutional Army nevertheless; it has its commander-in-chief whether it is encamped upon the plains of Mexico or South Carolina or is in New York harbor. Although municipal or constitutional law is generally said to be territorialized, so far as the Army of the country goes, wherever it goes its Commander-in-Chief goes as its constitutional head; the President of the United States and the Constitution therefore follows the Army wherever the military government of the country carries that Army.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator be so kind as to point to that clause of the Constitution which limits the military power of the Government within circumscribed boundaries as against the enemies of the country?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I will do that with pleasure. The Constitution of the country, I will again inform my friend, as I was going on to say, governs the Army of the United States, regulates its administration through Congress in providing rules and regulation for it wherever that Army may be, and it restricts most carefully the exercise of the military power beyond certain limits; and when it speaks of the exercise of military power—I am not using its language, but the scope and purpose of it—when it allows the military power, the power to make war, the power to suppress insurrection and rebellion, to be brought into play, it is to be construed, as my friend well knows, by the same principles of public law and the civilized understanding of mankind as if they were incorporated into it. That is what I have to say. Therefore I hold, in answer to my friend, that the Army of the United States under any express power given to it by Congress, or under the Constitution, or without the Constitution under public law, is not an irresponsible body that may do whatever its will or the will of its commander is, or the will of the body that created it may be, to take this man's life or that man's property; but that it is governed by as fixed, as regular, and as absolute a limit to its authority and to its jurisdiction as any other function of government is; and among those limits I undertake to say, without the fear of contradiction by my friend here, [Mr. DRAKE,] or by my friend there, [Mr. WILSON,] that it was never heard of, and I trust it never will be, that where the Army governs, life or liberty is put in peril, either rightfully or wrongfully, by any commission except that which the military organizes from itself. It would be an outrage upon the nineteenth century were it otherwise.

Now, we have an Army. We have the power; we govern there by the Army; and is it to be said that we are driven to the poor expedient of departing from this regular and well-understood military power that we possess, to depute to an officer of the Army the power to pick up from the streets any patriot, good or bad—and no matter how good, because I do not intend to speak with disrespect to these southern patriots; I believe in them as much as anybody—persons to administer for a few months the functions that we are to exercise, in order to reach over the southern aristocracy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator whether the government here provided is not a mixed government now; whether the government proposed by this bill and contemplated by it is not mixed, part military and part civil.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In my judgment it is not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask the Senator, then, whether, while he provides supreme military power, he does not authorize the military power to employ the civil?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In a certain sense I do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, sir, if you authorize the military to employ the civil, and give him power to remove that civil, may he not substitute the civil, may he not replace the civil again?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not follow at all, and for this reason: we do not create a civil government there by these bills. If we were to do so I should be for creating quite a different one from what exists there now, based upon quite a different constituency. I mean an active constituency who are to elect rulers. I should exclude a good many more rebels than are excluded now, and I should, of course, include a great many more loyal men than ever had any voice in electing any of the officers who are holding places in the South at this time. But Congress by these reconstruction acts takes the case as it finds it. It finds there set up by the President, in one form or another, a government de facto, a body of men who administer certain laws. I am not going into a dissertation to decide what the precise technical name of that is; I am speaking of the fact. Within those geographical limits that we call States there is found a body of men who are administering certain rules and principles that are called laws. Now, we just tolerate that state of things; we allow it to go on. We are not responsible for it; but we say just as far as that existing state of things interferes in the least degree, in the judgment of the military officer in command, with the proper administration of military rule there; that is to say, with an administration which shall secure to every man life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, just so far it shall be innocuous, and to that end the offices shall have power to depose this existing government by whatever name you call it.

Now, the power to depose an existing government that has no legal authority in the affirmative sense to uphold it, is quite different from the power of substituting in that government one officer for another. In the one instance you legalize and perpetuate and perfect a government that had no legal authority for it, and in the other you merely set aside an existing state of things which interferes with your paramount military will. It appears to me that the distinction is quite obvious.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me one moment? If he will I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Maine who interrogated him. I recollect that some time ago a general of the Army, who was afterward a candidate for the Presidency, deposed, set aside, and arrested the members of the Legislature of Maryland. Half the country applauded that act, perhaps more. I should like to know from the Senator from Maine whether in his judgment the party in the country—that portion of the mind of the country which approved that act of General McClellan, by virtue of their approval—signified fairly, or whether the argument went to the extent of signifying that had General McClellan gone further and created another legislature, appointed by military order a succeeding Legislature of Maryland, that, too, would have been within the scope of his duties and equally meritorious? The argument seems to me to be that if a military man has a right to brush aside an obstruction, then he has a right to appoint, whether for life or term of years as the case may be, an officer in the place of him whom he deposes and removes. I think the case I have stated is sufficiently parallel to justify me in asking the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think they are as wide apart as it is possible to conceive. In the case of Maryland it had a government de facto and de jure. Nobody doubted that. The military general in command arrested men who were trying to destroy it. Maryland had not rebelled. Up to that hour, whatever might be said of individuals, she was loyal to the Constitution and maintained her integrity. There was a Legislature that undertook to take her out of the Union—to make war. The general in command arrested them. That is that case. Here is a case where the State governments are overthrown.

Mr. CONKLING. But the question is whether McClellan had power to appoint another Legislature?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am coming to that: I am trying to lay the foundations for that answer. [Laughter.] Here is a case where the State governments are gone, absolutely overthrown, and we put on record here that there is no State government at all. There is no office in all the South, and of course there is no officer; no office and no function. The cases are not parallel at all; and if the cases are not parallel, the question of authority in the two cannot be the same, I submit, by any means. In the last case there is no authority which can be interposed; in the first there was. In the first it was necessary for you to overthrow authority in order to reach the point; but in the case we are dealing with there is no authority whatever; I mean on our theory. On the theory of the Attorney General there is. On the theory that there are offices down there having functions, it is true that the case my honorable friend puts would be parallel; but on our theory that there are no State governments at all there, and no officers and no offices, I submit there is no parallel, and of course the question of authority in this case cannot be any possibility arise.

Mr. YATES. I ask the Senator whether he does not think General McClellan had as much power to appoint a legislature of civilians as of officers and soldiers?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Doubtless if we were to go into that question, I should agree with the Senator on that point. But, sir, I have not felt at all embarrassed by the question of authority in this case from the point of view we have been legislating. If we are to legislate upon the ground that these State governments are absolutely overthrown and there is no civil authority, then it appears to me that the authority we exercise here may be purely military, or it may be as the bill proposes and beyond question is mixed, military and civil. Now, if I understand the theory of this bill, and if I understand the fact, the legal position of the bill, it is that while you declare that the military government which you set up is supreme, you authorize that military government to exercise its functions through the employment of civil agents. That is so. Well, sir, if you can authorize the military to employ civil agents that happen to be in power, can you not authorize the military to remove those civil agents and appoint others? I see no difficulty at all in doing that. It seems to me that is the logic, and that is the necessity of the case on that theory. But I am sorry to say that the bill does not quite maintain that theory. I think the second section of this bill speaks about officers, officers performing functions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or persons exercising those duties.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, it speaks of "officers."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to explain? I admit prima facie the force of that suggestion from those words alone, but I venture to say to my friend confidentially, so that it will not get to the ear of the Attorney General, that we put in all the words in the vocabulary, so that it could not be set up in a special demurrer that we had not described the individuals. I hope, then, my friend will not make points against us on that ground.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not question the motives or the wisdom of the bill; and I was not disposed to quarrel with it, nor am I now. I propose to vote for it as it is, but upon the interpretation, not that there are officers there, but that there are persons there exercising certain duties, and calling them persons, I have no difficulty at all in voting for the bill; and I have no difficulty in voting for the amendments proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts as a question of authority. As a question of expediency whether it is worth while at this late period to sweep all these persons who are performing these functions out of their places and to put others in, that is a question about which I can conceive that gentlemen may well differ.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator to waive that to allow me to make a motion that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. HENDERSON. No; let us adjourn now. You can bring that up to-morrow if you choose. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of bill of the House (No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

The SPEAKER. On this bill the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no desire to address the House, and I do not flatter myself that anything which anybody can say will change anybody's vote; but it appears to me that, as the minority member of the committee reporting the bill, I ought to say something at least in the way of protest. But before I proceed further I crave the protection of the Speaker to enforce the rules of debate, so as to save me from those points of interrogation or exclamation that so often crop out or pop out from gentlemen skilled in dialectics, who interject speeches within speeches, and thus destroy all unity of argument or thought. I crave this also because of the very serious subject-matter before us, because of the brief time allowed us, (only an hour and a half,) and I need all of my little portion of that time without rejoinder or surrejoinder, rebuttal or surrebuttal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York gives notice that he will not be interrupted in his remarks, and he will proceed.

Mr. BROOKS. Twenty-four years ago there assembled in Faneuil Hall, Boston, a little convention of men, one of whom has recently received the thanks of the Duke of Argyle and other noble lords of England for the destructions they have perpetrated upon the Constitution and the institutions of the United States—thanks naturally enough flowing from an oligarchy who see that success with us is death to them, and thanks, therefore, easily to be accounted for from such a high-born, aristocratic quarter. This little Faneuil Hall convention then founded a great party, which, spreading beyond Massachusetts, embraced at last both the middle and the western States; and the platform upon which they established their party was the following:

"Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States is a covenant with death and an agreement with hell, which ought to be immediately annulled."

Our Peter the Hermit, the great fanatical Crusader, having accomplished his object—the forcible emancipation of four million slaves at a cost of at least four billion dollars to his country, the legacy of a most oppressive and apparently inextinguishable debt, which not only grinds the laborer to the dust, but in every way cripples all working capital—having witnessed the slaughter of half a million of his countrymen, and heard the cries of widows and orphans almost innumerable, naturally enough deemed his mission accomplished, and went over to England to be fêted, there to repose among dukes and duchesses, grateful to him for his great work of destruction. The party, however, which he then and there formed in Faneuil Hall, we now see entering upon a new mission, into fresh crusades, not now for the emancipation of four million blacks, but for the enslavement of eight million whites—men of their own kith, kin, and color, and physical organization. And we have here in the bill before us, in substance soon to become a law, a bill of destruction, which will entitle these new crusaders, if they ever go over the sea, to like honor from fresh dukes of Argyle, or other noble lords of England. The work to be accomplished by this bill is the complete annulment of the Federal Constitution, that covenant with death, that agreement with hell, the complete annulment, the end of what Garrison began twenty-four years ago in Boston.

What is first worthy of note in the bill before us is, that in a time of profound peace, when all war has been over, two years and more, save from the yell of the Sioux or Cheyenne, we have introduced a martial bill, full of martial pains and penalties, as if, flagrante bello, we were amid the very roar of cannon, or in the clash of squadrons of infantry and cavalry. Peace everywhere, save on the prairies or plains, blesses our great country. But now, long after the Temple of Janus is closed, we have martial law, military commissions, the destruction of courts and of all civil law proposed. The only other war existing is one of those hitherto peaceful wars between the Democratic and some other ever opposing party, when now the anti-Democratic party, in order to keep itself in office, and to keep us out, overrides, obliterates, tramples under foot ten States of our Union and the twelve million people that dwell in them.

That such a bill, which I shall proceed to analyze, has never before been contemplated by the leaders of the majority party in this House, nay, not until this late period, when it sees party power constitutionally departing, is not only evident from its hitherto recorded history in the journals of Congress, but clear also from the decision of their own Chief Justice, who, prior to these military bills, in the Indiana military commission case, though of the Republican party, expressed his judicial condemnation of all such military bills in time of peace. "We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists," said Chief Justice Chase from the minority in the Indiana military tribunal case. "Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail." "Where peace exists," expressly says the Chief Justice, "the laws of peace must prevail." But here, in the time of a profound peace, there is embodied in this bill, in the most objectionable form, almost every article of the laws of war. Here, too, is a bill which subverts from top to bottom, in its very foundations, the Constitution of the United States, and which, amid its many iniquities, one of the least though, violates that guarantee of the Constitution, (article four, section four,) that secures to every State of this Union a republican form of government, for no republican form of government, nor the shadow of one, can exist under the outrageous provisions of this bill.

This bill itself in its grand outlines is a Pentarchy, a bill creating five monarchs, a bill subverting Magna Charta—a bill ignoring the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and over ten States of this Union installing the pentarchy, or five monarchies more fearful, more odious, more damnable even than any that reign over Europe or Asia or even Africa. Let us analyze this bill, then, and see whether I exaggerate its character. What is its first section? It subverts the governments in four of the old States of this Union and in six other States not of the original thirteen. It goes further than the two bills which have preceded it, making worse what seemed as bad as possible before, in not only declaring those State governments "illegal," but by going further and declaring them "void." Hitherto we have heard of "dead States"—an idea first started, I think, in the Senate of the United States—States whose corpses only were existing. But here for the first time it is proposed to put into the form of law the solemn declaration that the governments of ten States are void; that those States are dead, their governments not only illegal, but void; and these ten States of our Union, four of them of the original thirteen that formed the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, in framing this bill no regard has been paid to the history of the past, not even to a sentiment or a recollection. When the name of Greece or Rome or any classic land or classic institution is tingled in our ears, whenever we read of them in history, there is associated with the Parthenon, or with Marathon, or with the Pantheon, the Capitoline hill, or Tarpeian rock, something that touches the heart and makes the blood run warmly through all our veins. But here is a State across the Potomac whose history is ours, that did more for the creation of this Government than any other State whatever; a State more classic and glorious in its history than the Parthenon of Greece or the Pantheon of Rome; a State struck out of existence by the first section of this infamous bill. Sir, I have been upon the plains of Marathon and by the passes of Thermopylae, and my heart has warmed as I reflected upon the history of the noble Greeks that there saved their native land; but never, never, amid all such classic scenes have I ever felt the enthusiasm which inspired me upon the rising grounds of Mount Vernon, before the tomb of Washington, or upon the plains of Montpelier, or upon the heights of Monticello, or when I have fallen upon my knees before the tomb of Marshall. In no part of the earth wherever an American may go, in no place where history makes a record of life, is there ground so classic and so glorious as that within a fifty miles radius around the city of Richmond, in Virginia. There, within that radius, was born the father of his country; there flashed out the fiery and electric eloquence of Patrick Henry; there was born the President of the First Congress; there the homes of the Randolphs and Harrisons; there the illustrious Jefferson and Madison and Monroe; there was born our Winfield Scott, and there have been nursed into existence some of the most illustrious commanders of our own Federal Army. And yet this State whose record is thus bright all over in history, a deformed Congress, a mutilated Congress, a Congress born from the blood and genius of Virginia, strikes out from the Union that glorious star, the star of Virginia, a lost pleiad in our own history; a pleiad that will return back with some returning orb to shine brighter and more beautifully in the constellation of our country, brighter than Orion or the Pleiades ever shone in the astronomical history of the geographer.

South Carolina, too, is struck out, the land of Rutledge and of Pinckney, and of Marion and of Sumter; Georgia, also, that gave the country the two great States of Mississippi and Alabama. Sir, whatever may have been the errors of those States of the original Thirteen, whatever wrongs in the misjudgment of the Constitution they may have inflicted upon the country, whatever crimes they may have committed, in the warmth of your hearts, if you were but men in your feelings and sympathies, you would feel now as you feel for struggling Greece or for the Cretans in their contest with the Turks, who are not inflicting upon those people barbarities in principle greater than those you propose to inflict in the act before you.

Now, sir, two of these ten States, Louisiana and Arkansas, obliterated by your bill, are part of the great Louisiana purchase. The faith of treaties in the most solemn of obligations is violated here in the act which you propose to pass into a law by depriving them of all protection for their liberty and property. Arkansas you will remember, or you all know, is a part of the Louisiana purchase. Arkansas and Louisiana were parts of that territory of Louisiana which Mr. Jefferson purchased from France, and which under the treaty of that purchase, (1803,) article three, has the following solemn compact:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

This bill violates that treaty, that solemn treaty; and France, with all her power, will have the right, the legal right, if this bill become a law, to appear before us and to claim that all the civil institutions, all the rights—the rights of liberty and property—which we have shall also be theirs as citizens of the United States. We are solemnly pledged to a foreign Power to govern the people of these States according to the Federal Constitution, not by military commissions nor by martial laws; and hence what we are doing is not only in violation of high moral principles, but in violation of a most solemn treaty we have made with France for the purchase of Louisiana.

The last words of the first section of this bill are as follows:

And that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the authority of Congress.

No broader words can be used in a grant of power. "Subject in all respects to the military commanders." If human genius had exerted its greatest ingenuity to devise to rob the people of their rights and privileges, to degrade and dishonor a people, to trample twelve million people under foot, it would have used these very words: "subject in all respects to the military commanders."

In the second section, Mr. Speaker, these military commanders are given the power—

To remove or suspend from office any municipal or State officer or person exercising authority under or by virtue of any so-called State government existing in his district; and the said officer so assigned to command as aforesaid is hereby empowered to appoint another person in the stead of the officer or person so removed, if he shall deem proper so to do; and whenever he may deem it necessary as aforesaid to prohibit, suspend, or set aside any act or proceeding of any such State or municipal government, or any act or thing done under or by virtue of its authority; and all acts heretofore done by any such officer in accordance herewith shall be deemed valid.

All acts heretofore done shall be valid! Here are embodied the most violent principles of legislation, against which we have attempted to be guarded in the Constitution of the United States. It is a law to be not only "retrospective," which might in some cases be justified, but a law "retroactive," which is unjustifiable, and a law "ex post facto," which is in defiance of the Constitution of the United States. It affirms and legalizes all acts done heretofore by any such officers. It is declared that they shall be deemed valid.

Now, have the members of this House given any attention to what we are legalizing, what it is that is to be deemed valid? Before we enter into that species of legislation I would ask the honorable gentlemen on the other side if they know how many military laws or edicts they render valid? I beg them before they proceed to the passage of this act to have before them some military "Little & Brown" codification of the laws which they are to render valid. Sir, I have read the Pandects of Justinian, and I revere those Pandects as a monument of human wisdom. But here are the edicts of Sickles and Sheridan, and no man knows how many there are, and they are all declared to be valid. Whoever before heard of such blind, such fatal legislation? All that Sickles has done, all that Sheridan has done, is "valid;" and yet I defy any Republican member on this floor to tell me the twentieth part of the things done and now proposed to be enacted into law.

The genius of Sickles has been prolific of edicts. I hold in my hand a batch of them almost as voluminous as the Pandects of Justinian. He institutes edicts for the collection of debts, modifies the existing laws for the enforcement of judgments, utters decrees for the payment of money, sets aside proceedings instituted in the courts, prohibits in certain cases the right to bring suits, enjoins proceedings on execution for the term of twelve months, giving new liens in certain cases, establishes homestead exemptions, declares what shall be a legal tender, abolishes in certain cases the remedy by foreign attachment, abolishing bail as heretofore authorized in cases ex contractu, but not in other cases known as actions ex delicto, &c., &c. General order No. 25 reads as follows:

"1. The distillation or manufacture of whisky or other spirits from grain is prohibited in this military district. Any person so engaged or employed will be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. The possession of a still or other apparatus for this purpose will be considered presumptive evidence of a violation of the revenue laws, and the party or parties using the same, or on whose premises, or in whose possession the same may be found, will be arrested and brought to trial before a military tribunal composed of the commanding officer of the post and two officers of the Army next in rank on duty within the territorial limits of the post. If the exigencies of the service do not permit the detail of other officers, that fact will be duly certified, and the post commander will hear and determine the case."

And here all these extraordinary edicts of Sickles relating to property and individual rights are declared by the final lines of the third section to be valid and to be as laws of the United States under the Sickles monarchy of the Carolinas.

Sir, I know not how many military orders have been issued in all, from the five monarchies, but, from the best information I can get, on computation I can make them some one thousand in all. And here, groping in the dark, without knowing what we do, we pronounce all these edicts or orders, retrospective, retroactive, or ex post facto; we pronounce them all to be legal or valid law.

The third section of this bill directs the registration I know not by how many boards in the southern States, but I presume the computation is small when I say that they must number some two thousand in all, for they have already cost $500,000, and a sum as much more is necessary in order to keep them up. These boards of registration are made up of white, black, and mulatto, the black predominating in many cases, or the mulatto balancing the board, so that there shall be an equal number, half white, half black. These boards thus created are forbidden to regard the oath which the citizen takes, and at their pleasure they may strike from the list the name of any one already registered who in their judgment improperly took the oath. And record evidence is not to be required, but parole evidence shall be sufficient. The evidence of any negro or mulatto against any white citizen will deprive him of his right to vote. In all these doings these two thousand boards of registry, white, black and yellow, are "not to be bound or governed in their action by any opinion of any officer of the United States Government;" for such are the words of the act.

What a government and registration you are thus creating in the southern States! Over two thousand boards with different laws, different expositions of the laws, different constructions to be given to them throughout, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande; and however diverse or adverse shall be that construction, no opinion of any officer of the Government is binding upon them, and there is to be no uniformity of construction. Why, one of the very blessings of Government is uniformity of action and of law; but here you enact that there shall be two thousand different laws of registration, with no Federal officer or any other power to create uniformity. The white man is given up to the negro, where negro registers predominate, or vice versa, if you please, and a premium is thus created to start a war of races.

The fourth section of this act not only annihilates all State courts—what you have done before—but it goes yet further, takes one new step, and, for the first time, strikes at the Government of the United States by declaring—

That no civil court of the United States or of any State shall have jurisdiction of any proceeding civil or criminal, against any such district commander, or any officer or person acting by his authority for or on account of the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this act.

At first you were but bold enough to strike out of existence the State courts; but now you are bold enough to strike out of existence the courts of the United States—to destroy them at one fell blow. Your ban is general against courts and judges in any form. You seem to have a horror of the wig or the gown, and to trust only in epaulettes as fit governments for the people of ten States.

The fifth section declares—

That no district commanders shall be relieved from the command assigned to him under the aforesaid acts, unless the Senate shall have first advised and consented thereto, or unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered or dismissed from the Army, or unless he shall consent to be so relieved.

Sir, I know not what the President of the United States may do; I know not what he may feel it his duty to do; I know that he is the executive officer of the United States, pronounced at one time to be the Government of the United States, against whom it was disloyal to utter even a word of censure. I know that he was the great power, the Brobdingnag of this Government. But he has suffered himself to be bound by a set of miserable Lilliputians, and there in the cords with which they have bound him, he struggles, but now struggles in vain to free himself. Thus having bound him, you now propose to revolute the Constitution (article two, section two,) and to take from him the command of the Army of the United States. You forbid him to exercise his constitutional authority to post his generals where he thinks the public interest demands. Sir, if I were President of the United States, before I put a veto on this high-handed act, I would send Sheridan to govern the States of Massachusetts and Maine, to make or unmake their Governors, their judges, their police, what their Representatives seem to rejoice in when practiced upon others; while I would send Sickles to Walrusia to educate the Esquimaux, or to be educated by them in the principles of civil and constitutional liberty. But you tell me you would then impeach the President. Sir, there are worse conditions than being impeached by a mutilated Congress of these United States, and one of them is being used to destroy the Constitution and Government of these United States. I tell the President the only chance he now has of being reelected President of the United States is in being impeached by a Rump House, and turned out by a Rump Senate, and the Presiding Officer of that Senate being forced into his place. Sir, if the revolution ends thus, the historical end of all such revolutions as we are passing through, and if we make President that gentleman who with Senators has been "swinging round the circle" in Nebraska, Missouri, and Kansas, there making, as reported, agrarian speeches, a la Prudhomme of the French Revolution, then, when we come to his divisions of property, beginning here in this House, say with the Representative from Boston, or the Representative from the Taunton district, and ending with him from Lynn, then, I say, such will be the common revelry that in the intoxication of our joy we may reelect the present President of the United States. By the Constitution, the higher law, the supreme law, the President is made commander of the Army and Navy; and he is faithless to that Constitution if in the apprehension of impeachment he suffers that power to depart from him, as you propose in the fifth section of this bill.

And now, as if this bill was not bad enough, fierce enough, gentlemen after gentlemen propose to make it fiercer, to add to its ferocities. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] amends the bill by ordering all State, county, and municipal officers to take the test oath, in order to concentrate all local representation in the military order. Another honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] from whom I had expected better things, proposes to punish any person who attempts to prevent or obstruct the execution of these acts by a fine of $5,000, to be levied by the military commander, or imprisonment of one year, or both the $5,000 fine and jail, as the military commander may will. Another gentleman, from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] proposes to be less merciful than his Maker, which is to allow no presidential pardon to avail an unhappy southerner, but to keep him forever excluded from his citizenship—his right to vote. There seems to be a competition among gentlemen on the other side to outbid each other in the arts of cruelty and all the devices of degradation and punishment; and we are indebted to the tender mercies, it seems, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to save us from another Draconian code.

Mr. Speaker, I was about to be so much out of order as to quote the Constitution of the United States, and to show this House that this bill could not be passed by men who have sworn here to support that Constitution; but I forbear. I know there is but little, very little respect for that instrument here, and some on this floor have gone so far as to pronounce it "played out." There is, however, some respect felt in this House—more especially by lawyers here—for what are known as Magna Charta, the petition of rights, the bill of rights, extorted by our British ancestors from their kings. Hence I propose to go back to those great eras of British liberty, in order, if possible, to arouse American lawyers here to the noble defense of human rights, which British lawyers have seldom or never failed to make. In the most disastrous days of British history, when all liberty seemed to be cloven down, the British have ever sent forth some brilliant men to uphold Magna Charta and the bills of rights, while I regret to say, the American bar, more especially the Republican portion of the American bar, have failed us in the hour of trial. I beg the Republican lawyers, then, in this House to hear me read a chapter from Magna Charta, which was extorted from King John in the year 1215 by our semi-barbarous ancestors. It will be well understood, although it is in monkish Latin, not in the classic style of Horace or Tacitus or Sallust:

"Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut dissolvatur, vel libero tenementis suis, vel libertatibus, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, vel utlagetur, aut exiliatur, aut aliquo modo destruat; nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ. Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel iustitiam."

Which is thus translated:

"No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or seized of his freehold or his liberties or free customs, or be outlawed or banished, or in any way destroyed; and we will not pass upon him, nor condemn him but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the laws of the land. We will sell (referring to justice and its administration) to no man, and we will not deny nor defer either right or justice to any man."

This was as long ago as 1215. The confirmatio chartarum in the reign of King Edward was in 1297; and in the reign of King Henry III, there was a like declaration. The right of trial by jury, by a jury of his peers, was guaranteed to every British-born subject in the barbarous ages. But here, in this Congress, in spite of the Declaration of Independence, here, in this mournful year 1867, twelve millions of human beings, white and black, are denied all trial before their peers, all courts or processes of law; and we propose to enact a measure more barbarous in principle, more indefensible than any of the violent and extraordinary acts of King John, from whom the British barons extorted this charter.

Sir, if there is no respect paid to the barbarous Latin of this declaration extorted from King John by the barons at Runnymede, I trust some respect will be paid to the illustrious spirits of our own history who in the last generation, in all the States of this Union, copied from Magna Charta and embodied in their various State constitutions similar principles of human liberty.

North Carolina is one of the States that you propose to strike out of this Union—North Carolina, where originated the Declaration of Independence—the Mecklenburg declaration, which was adopted some time before Mr. Jefferson had drafted the Declaration put forth by the Continental Congress. The first declaration of the State of North Carolina contains these provisions:

"That all political power is vested in and derived from the people only.

"That the people of this State ought to have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police thereof.

"That no freeman shall be put to answer any criminal charge, but by indictment, presentment or impeachment.

"That no freeman shall be convicted of any crime but by the unanimous verdict of a jury of good and lawful men in open court, as heretofore used.

"That no freeman ought to be taken, imprisoned; or dispossessed of his freehold, liberties, or privileges; or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land.

"That the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of the State; and as standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty they ought not to be kept up; and that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power."

But North Carolina is a southern State. I call the attention of gentlemen, then, from Massachusetts to their own principles of liberty, their own declaration of rights:

"ART. I. All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and inalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness."

"5. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, those several magistrates and officers of government vested with authority, whether legislative, executive or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them.

"10. Each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it, in the enjoyment of his life, liberty and property, according to the standing laws."

"No part of the property of any individual can with justice be taken from him or applied to the public use without his own consent, or that of the representative body of the people. In fine, the people of this Commonwealth are not controllable by any other laws than those to which their constitutional representative body have given their consent."

"12. No person shall be arrested, imprisoned, or despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land."

"And the Legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment (excepting for the government of the Army and Navy) without trial by jury."

The charter of New Hampshire is fuller than this of these great principles of liberty. I have not time to read them. The charter of Vermont is even yet fuller than that of New Hampshire. In those days the New England people were faithful to liberty. They were never before as unfaithful to the liberty of their own white race as now to eight millions of their own skin, color, and organization.

Sir, the Declaration of Independence in numerous sections condemns in spirit and intent the whole principle of this bill, and I do not wonder that on the 4th of July last, the Republican party failed to celebrate it as heretofore, for this Declaration of Independence cannot be read now in a Republican assembly without making every Republican blush.

I know I am to be told that we have the power, as the South is a conquered people, to pass the bill; that the Constitution is abrogated there and that by the rights of conquest we can make this extraordinary law. Sir, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who introduced this bill, proposed at first only confiscation, but here is an enslavement of twelve millions of human beings in this bill. First it abrogates all their rights of property. The liberty of the citizen is entirely in the hands of the military commanders. The life of every man is at the absolute disposal of one man, and that man the President of the United States. Tell me, oh, tell me not, then, of four million black people having been emancipated from chattel slavery when by this act you impose a cruel legal slavery in its most odious forms, without the right of property, liberty, or life, without any personal right, upon eight million white human beings, a worse than chattel slavery.

I deny, sir, that there is anything which justifies confiscation, or the passage of such an act under the right of conquest. I could read whole chapters from Grotius, or Vattel, or Puffendorf, and from Wheaton and Story and Kent, which condemn this bill. It is in utter defiance of natural, and national, and constitutional law, and I say to you now that may be concerned in it, many of you will live to repent of the tyranny here about to be perpetrated, as bygone tyrants have repented of like tyranny perpetrated upon their people.

I might cite the prize cases if I had time, and show that they condemn the principles of this bill. All history condemns it too. Rome was built up in utter defiance of the principles of this bill. Rome governed every country, not by conquest and subjugation such as you propose, but by assimilating the conquered subjects with Roman citizens, by giving them Roman rights and Roman privileges and Roman citizenship, while here are eight million white human beings whom you deprive of every right of an American citizen. Even the Tartars, when they conquered China, did not destroy the institutions of China, but assimilated their institutions with those of the conquered. And when Cyrus conquered the Assyrians of old, he respected their rights and privileges, and guaranteed to them all the liberties they possessed.

There is no parallel in history for this bill but that of the infamous conduct of the Duke of Alva, in Spain. Answer me not that he destroyed twenty thousand lives, for here you destroy what is more precious than life: the right of a man to his liberty, the sentiment that he is a man, that he is equal before other men. Why, sir, I had rather lose my life a thousand times than live under the government of these five monarchs as established by the infamous principles of this infamous bill. Our English ancestors, even Charles II, after the bloodiest of civil wars, gave peerages to Monk and Fleetwood and a mitre to Baxter, while you only give military tyrants to your people, and declare a total abnegation of their rights. Even Louis XVIII, though a Bourbon, made marshals and statesmen of Bonapartists, while you have exerted in this bill all of your ingenuity to deprive the white people of their right to vote. When Hungary was subjugated and overthrown the Emperor of Austria did not exert such tyrannical power over the Huns, for he gave them a constitution and he gave them a parliament, while you take away from the southern people their constitution and laws, and refuse them representation in the national legislature. The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, two great Tories, were more liberal and merciful to the Irish people than you are to the people of the South. Although O'Connell was the instigator of riots in Ireland, the Duke of Wellington and his party did not refuse him a seat as a member of Parliament from the county of Clare, while you shut out the Kentucky delegation from seats here simply for the reason that they differ from you in politics, and for that and that alone.

Sir, I deprecate the passage of this bill in its effect upon the people of the southern country. Far better would it be for that land, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, to be as it was one hundred and fifty years ago, a howling wilderness, than to be subjected to the amalgamation of races, which you are proposing in this bill. Our country is now made up of many different races, not only Caucasian, Mongolian, Indian, Chinese, and Japanese about to come here in the Pacific steamers by thousands, and at last the Esquimaux: but you have selected the least intelligent, the poorest informed, except the Esquimaux; you have selected the African to share with you copartnership in this Government, while your own wives and children, your minor boys are shut out from the right of suffrage. You have given to the negro equality and copartnership with the white man. Sir, it is impossible for these two races, in my judgment, ever to live together on terms of intimacy, amity, and friendship, as you propose in this bill. You have stored up and are yet storing up for them the elements of awful strife which will produce a perpetual conflict of races.

Sir, the negro Haytien is wiser than you. He allows no white man to own real estate on that island. The black Liberian is wiser than you. He allows no white man to share with him the government of that country. The experiment in Jamaica of a mingled government has broken down, and all free government there is absorbed by the British Parliament, which now through orders in council, disregarding both whites and blacks, exercises supreme power. Nowhere on earth has ever this mixed government succeeded.

One race is superior to another. God so ordained, and no fiat or authority of yours can bring down the Caucasian to the African, or bring up the African to the Caucasian. All efforts, all struggles will be in vain. And this is no new experiment. It has been tried throughout the whole of Spanish America. Juarez, a half Indian, now governor and ruler of Mexico, is just now showing there the barbaric character of this mingled Government of unnaturally associated races, while the numerous other Spanish-negro-Indian hybrid States there, are almost all of them in constant civil war, armies running and overrunning one another, with the blood of the white man and the blood of the negro both deteriorated by thus commingling, and yet here this rash, this fearful, this dreadful experiment! No, not an experiment, for experience has already shown that it never can succeed. You propose to mix and mingle the twelve millions of your countrymen in the southern States of the Union. You take the most ignorant, the most uneducated, the most brutish of the population and give them absolute control in boards of registration or through the ballot-box. It needs not the eye of prophecy, it needs no skill of divination to foretell what must be the effect of such a crime as this, for all history shows you what has been its effect and pronounces what it will be hereafter.

But, sir, I find that I must draw to a close, and allow me to say in doing so that I know just now you are here above public opinion, not only the public opinion of this country, but of the world. But there is an unwritten law, there is a law of God that embodies itself in public opinion, which hereafter will hold you responsible for the destruction of the institutions of your country. You may overthrow the Constitution, you may press the previous question upon us and allow us but half a day for the discussion of the great principles of this bill, but history, posterity, will do us justice. I have long been in public life, but this is none the proudest hour of that life, if I am never able to speak again, to remonstrate here in this House, and to make a record of this remonstrance against the outrageous, the infamous principles of this tyrannical military bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire now to make a correction which I rose to make when the gentleman was speaking, not knowing of his request at the outset not to be interrupted. If I understood him right he stated that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] had recently, on his western tour, made a speech in which he avowed agrarian sentiments; and among other things advocated an equal division of property. If the gentleman so stated I wish to say that that Senator has utterly denied the expression of any such sentiment. I deem it due to the Senator from my State that the misrepresentation should be corrected here and placed on record.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, there are some propositions that it is almost impossible to discuss; there are some so palpable that an attempt at elucidation appears ridiculous; there are others so absurd that any attempt to prove by argument a negative appears preposterous. The legislation proposed partakes very much of this character. Besides, in the time allowed me by the limit of debate upon this question, I shall not attempt a discussion of the principles involved. I have not risen for any such purpose. I propose to offer to gentlemen on the other side, and especially to those gentlemen who have charge of this measure, some practical suggestions, not designed to be factious nor to excite them into greater hostility to the restoration of the Union, but to prevent if possible the further prolongation of reconstruction, and to produce a finality in regard to it, so that the people of the South may be satisfied that a bottom has been reached.

The bill before the House is by its title a bill supplementary to the acts of March 2 and March 23, 1867. By its provisions it is declaratory of the intention and scope of those acts. It is therefore part and parcel of the scheme of reconstruction, and is directly connected with the whole question. To a proper understanding of the subject, it is necessary to refer to antecedent events. At the close of the war President Johnson, acting doubtless from proper motives, essayed to restore the States, the rebellious States, to their proper relations to the Federal Government. He issued proclamations, appointed provisional governors, and threw the mantle of Federal power and protection over that people. Though there may be a doubt as to the power of the President to furnish officials for the local governments of States, yet what he did in this instance was from patriotic and philanthropic motives. This was the condition of matters on the assembling of the Thirty-Ninth Congress in December, 1865. Nothing had been definitely settled. Everything remained there in an unadjusted and disorganized state, and continued so until the act of March 2, 1867. In the meanwhile those people were without protection, without law, order, or government. They were there between the upper and the nether millstones—between an element to some extent unreconciled to the Government of the United States, and another element more dangerous to their well-being. Yet Congress for two whole years left them in that condition.

Upon the 2d of March, 1867, Congress passed the original act to which it is now proposed to add this amendment. What were the provisions of that act? We are told that this session of Congress would have had no existence except for the fact that the provisions of that act have been wrongfully construed by the law officer of the Government. Sir, that act is very simple; its provisions are very few; and its language, in my judgment, is very explicit. I do not believe that there is any lawyer in this House, nor indeed any man in the United States, who, if he will throw aside his political interests or prejudices, can have any difficulty in its construction. It proposes to admit the southern States into the Union by a certain process. It proposes that the process shall begin with a division of that territory into five military districts. It gives to the President of the United States the power to appoint the commanding general of each of those districts. The original proposition was to give to General Grant this power. That was in the first instance the determination of the majority in both Houses of Congress, to override that part of the Constitution which makes the President the chief executive of the Government of this country. But upon consultation they feared to adopt a provision so palpably in violation of the fundamental law; and instead of passing the military bill originally proposed, they provided that the President of the United States should appoint those generals. In this regard, at least, they left the bill free from the objection which had been made to it.

The power of these commanding generals was fully and unequivocally declared as confined to the protection of all persons in their person and property, &c. Congress adjourned, and immediately upon the adjournment the present Congress commenced its session. It was soon discovered that there were defects in the law of March 2; defects, not so far as concerned the principles of the act, but in the machinery by which the registers were to be made up and the voting to be accomplished. For the purpose of remedying those defects the act of March 23 was passed.

Congress, sir, shortly afterward adjourned. These generals had been appointed. They had repaired to their several departments. They commenced, honestly and in good faith, I doubt not, to carry out the provisions which Congress had adopted for the reconstruction of those States. They soon differed among themselves as to what the construction of those provisions should be. The commanding general of the Department of Virginia, came personally to the capital and appealed to the President and the Cabinet to give him directions with regard to his duties under the law. Others wrote to the President making similar requests. In the mean time they went on administering their duties on principles in antagonism with each other.

What did the President do? What was the duty of the President under these circumstances? I know, sir, that General Jackson would have given a construction to the law; and I know that he would not only have given a construction to it, but he would have demanded that that construction should be practically carried out by these subordinate military executive officers. But, sir, the present President asked for a construction of the law at the hands of the law-officer of the Government, whose duty it is under the law to give advice to the President and the other officials of the Government, including all the heads of the Departments. Was there anything wrong in the President thus asking the law-officer to give his construction of this law? Suppose the President had acted on his own judgment with regard to its construction, and had demanded that these military officers should execute the law according to his understanding of its intent, what would have been said in that case? What food would have been given for declamation and denunciation by his traders. It would have been called an impudent arrogation of power. But, sir, he did not do it. The law-officer of the Government—a lawyer, no politician, certainly no partisan—takes up those two acts, carefully examines their provisions and renders his opinions. Upon those opinions the President acts so far as transmitting their conclusions to the officers whose duty it is to respect them and to conform to them.

Mr. Speaker, the present session has been called and has its existence as the consequence of these opinions of the Attorney General. We are told ironically that we "are called together by Mr. Stanbery." Resolutions have been introduced into this House of the most derogatory and insulting character, in their aim to ridicule the Attorney General. There is no attempt to criticise those opinions. No one attempts to show their fallacy, or to prove that they are contrary to the spirit and the letter of the law. No, sir, we have abuse instead. We are told that this is an usurpation of power; that the President, through his Attorney General, is determined to throw obstructions in the way of reconstruction, and hence is furnished the pretext upon which this measure is reported to the House.

Sir, this bill in its first section is absurd. There is no lawyer in this House who will read the section and say it is not absurd and ridiculous:

That it is hereby declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act of the 2d day of March, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and of the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, in the year 1867, that the governments then existing in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were illegal and void; and that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts, and to the authority of Congress.

It declares that those governments were null and void. If they were null and void then they have been absolutely destroyed. Made void is annihilation. They then have no existence; and although the declaration itself is false—for the act of March 2 does in letter recognize them as existing through provisional existence—these governments are null and void. What then? In the same section it is provided: "and that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued," &c. In the first clause the thing is dead, and in the second clause it is not dead. They are to be continued under the direction of the military commanders.

Now, sir, that must lead to future litigation unless it is now corrected. It must lead to different constructions. "The dead liveth." These State governments are declared to have been destroyed, and that it was so intended by the act of March 2; yet it is provided that they are to be continued. How can you continue that which is defunctus officii? Death is death, legally and politically as well as physically. "Yet if continued," then they are to be subject to the military commanders.

Mr. Speaker, does that clause declare the truth? As I have before stated, that bill recognizes the existence of civil State governments. It declares them to be provisional. Still they have been recognized. It was not intended by act of Congress to abolish the regulations for the protection of property. All the municipal regulations for the protection of life and property were recognized. It was a principle of the former bill, and that was the construction put upon the law at the time by the leading men of this House, including the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] also by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and also by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] Therefore it was not only the provision of the bill that these governments were continued, although provisional, but such was the declared intent of the act at the time it was being passed by the two Houses.

Now, sir, with reference to the second section, it declares that these generals have the power—

To remove or suspend from office any municipal or State officer or person exercising authority under or by virtue of any so-called State government existing in his district; and the said officer so assigned to command as aforesaid is hereby empowered to appoint another person in the stead of the officer or person so removed.

Why, sir, have these generals a right under the constitution of the United States to do this? The Constitution explicitly declares who shall appoint subordinate officers. Is there any part of that instrument more plain than that section which refers to the power of the President to appoint all subordinate officers? But these commanding generals are empowered to appoint whom? Local State officers? No; the very moment that a commanding general removes a governor or a judge, or any other State officer and appoints another in his place, appointees become Federal officers. They lose their character as State officers because they derive their appointment from an officer who derives his appointment from the President of the United States. They become subordinate Federal officials. The Constitution declares plainly and palpably that the President shall appoint all subordinate officers of the Government, except in certain cases specified.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who is to pay these appointees of these generals? The State governments will not pay them, for they do not recognize them. Who is to make pecuniary provision for the payment of these officials which your generals appoint at their pleasure? And here let me say that the expenses already incurred amount to the sum appropriated at the last session, although the registration is scarcely commenced. The $500,000 is already exhausted, and Major General Sickles declares that he wants $500,000 in his own department; and not only does he want $500,000, but he wants the Navy as well. This imperial despot, who assumes the right to sit in judgment over two great States of the Union, who absorbs within his own person civil, military, judicial, and political power, wants $500,000 for himself and his dependents, and wants in addition to that the Navy of the United States to aid him in doing what? Oppressing the poor, impoverished, ruined, defenseless people of South and North Carolina.

But what further power do you propose to give to the generals by this section? "To prohibit, suspend, or set aside any act or proceeding of any such State or municipal government." Why, sir, they can annul the marriage contract under this provision. They can declare legitimacy illegitimate. "Any act or proceeding of any such State government." There is no restriction, no limitation. Contracts between man and man, relations between husband and wife, between father and son, the social and domestic, the religious and political relations of these people are put under the direction, power, and control of Major General Dan. Sickles and his compatriots established by Congress. Is that designed? I want Congress to say so openly and frankly. I want no covert act intending to impart power without explicitly declaring it. I want no further constructive acts or declaratory statutes as to what they intended. If that power is intended to be given (a power not possessed by the Czar of Russia, a power that no monarch in Europe, Asia, or Africa would dare to exercise, or if he did, could not exercise it for twenty-four hours) then they have power to do anything. If that is the design and object of this act why not say so in the bill? I am only surprised, in view of what has been done and what is being done, that you hesitate in openly and manfully declaring what you do design by conferring such extraordinary powers on military commanders.

The Constitution of the United States declares that our government is one of three coordinate powers—the Legislature to make the laws, the Executive to enforce them, and the Judiciary to construe them. But here it is attempted by act of Congress to place the military power beyond control or responsibility for any act which they may do, for any robbery or murder which they may commit. The military authorities are by this proposed bill placed where no court of the United States and no court of any State can reach them. Sir, is that law? Is that justice? Is that philanthropy? Is it in accordance with the spirit of this age of great moral ideas? Has humanity no claims upon the consideration of the party in power? Is it intended that brigadier generals shall be clothed with power which no law, human or divine, can reach? If so, say so. Do not phrase it in ambiguous language, leaving upon the mind of the ordinary reader a doubt as to what is intended. Let it be so said, plainly and palpably, that those who run may read.

But, Mr. Speaker—

"The evil that men do lives after them;
The good is often interred with their bones."

Remember that precedents are now being established in a government founded upon popular opinion, liable to the impulses of the people surging backward and forward from one extreme to the other; remember that in a popular government, where the people after all will control, the poisoned chalice may be returned to the lips of those who now present it to these people of the South. God forbid that any party should succeed this one who would follow their outrageous, inhuman, brutal, bloody examples. But, sir, in this country, as in all other popular governments, no man can say what may not be done by the impulse of the people. Hence I warn gentlemen against the consequences of thus declaring by act of Congress that military officers of the Government shall be subject to no power whatever, human or divine.

Again, it is provided by this bill that no district commander shall be relieved until the Senate consents to it. The civil tenure bill was bad enough; but under that act the President could remove or suspend upon proper charges, referring them to the Senate, to be passed upon afterward. How is it in this case? No one will deny that these are executive officers. You gave the President power to appoint them. The Constitution declares that it is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. He is their official superior. Suppose that any of those officers should commit any of the outrages which you propose to give them power to commit, where is the authority of the President during the recess of the Senate to act upon the matter and remove or suspend them? They can snap their fingers in his face, as they have done already in one or two instances. They can disregard all the powers of the Government. By this bill they are made directly amenable to no power but Congress; and Congress is to adjourn in a few days, not to meet again, I hope, until next December.

Mr. Speaker, I have already transcended the time allowed to me in this discussion. One word in conclusion. Make your bill so plain, if you please, make its provisions so stringent that there can be no doubt as to its intent. Do not forget that the injuries inflicted upon the people of the South by this delay, by this uncertainty, by these continual amendments of the law under which they are to live and act, constitute an outrage and an injury for which they have no remedy. Make your finality. They care not what you may do. They have now considerations deeper to them than that of suffrage. I tell you, sir, that the people of the South are entirely indifferent as to whether you allow them to vote or not. They want bread; they want security for life, liberty, and property; they want you to withdraw the military, which is exercising a despotic and destructive influence over their industry and of their social organization. They want to be allowed to enjoy their domestic and social institutions in peace and security. These are dearer rights than that conventional right of going to the ballot-box and depositing a vote. Give them this security. Give them rest.

You punished them during the war, you punished them at the close of the war, and you have been punishing them every hour since the close of the war. Your military satraps are among them. They have no rights. The negroes can butcher them and do butcher them. White females are left at the mercy of the brutality of their former slaves, while if a white man inflicts the least possible punishment upon a negro it is sent abroad to the country and is used as an argument for party purposes and to keep the southern people out of the Union which their fathers fought to establish and to which they now honestly desire to return.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let these people come back again into the Union. Let us once more be friends. Let us avail ourselves of their industry and their agricultural products, revive the credit of the country and reduce the taxation which is now bearing us all down. They are Americans as well as ourselves. In the meantime let us act fairly and justly and do our work so that hereafter there will be no necessity for further legislation. Let us have a finality and forever settle this question, but upon principles not so repugnant to law, justice, and mercy.

The SPEAKER. General debate has now closed under the notice given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now desire to ask for the previous question, for the purpose of ending this debate. I understand there are two amendments pending.

The SPEAKER. There are two amendments pending, one offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and one offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to correct an error in the printed bill, in the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no district commander shall be relieved from the command assigned to him under the aforesaid acts unless the Senate shall have first advised and consented thereto, or unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered or dismissed from the Army, or unless he shall consent to be so relieved.

I move to strike out line six, and to insert:

Or in arrest for an offense punishable by dismissal from the Army and disqualified by sickness from the performance of his duties.

The correction, by unanimous consent, was accordingly made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have my amendment read.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

That for the purpose of carrying out this or any other act of Congress all persons shall be considered as in the military or naval service as officers of the United States from the date of their being borne upon their respective Army and Navy registers as cadets, midshipmen, or acting midshipmen.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state that I offer that because those who left the Naval School or the Military Academy as cadets or midshipmen and went into the rebel service have been construed not to be such persons as are referred to in the law as having been officers in the United States service. I do not believe in that construction, and I wish to avoid its being made hereafter.

Mr. BAKER. I have the gentleman's consent to have the following amendment read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of this act and of the acts to which this is supplementary shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents of this act and of said acts may be fully and perfectly carried out.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If there is no objection that may be added as a part of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Clerk to read an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the second section by striking out and inserting as follows:

SEC. 2. All officers holding under the authority of such pretended governments, and not by virtue of any legal authority whatever, are hereby removed from their respective offices at the expiration of thirty days from the passage of this act, or sooner upon appointment of their successors as hereinafter provided; and it shall be the duty of the officer assigned to the command of any military district, under any of the acts to which this is a supplement, to fill the vacancies in said offices within said thirty days, or as soon as may be thereafter, by appointing only loyal men thereto, without distinction of race or color, who can take the oath of office prescribed by an act approved July 2, 1862, which appointments shall take effect from the date when the vacancies shall happen; and such commanding general may remove such officers at any time. And whenever such commander may deem it necessary for the due performance of his duty under said acts or either of them, or this act, to prohibit, suspend, or set aside any act or proceeding of any such State or municipal government, or any act or thing done under or by virtue of the authority of the same, he is empowered so to do; and all acts heretofore done by such commanding general in so removing such officers, or in prohibiting, suspending, or setting aside any such act, or proceeding, or thing done under such authority, are hereby made valid.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to have an amendment read.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Well, I shall not object to that.

Mr. COBURN. I move to add to the bill what I now send to the Chair.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Add the following sections:

SEC. —. If any person shall alter, mutilate, add to, or destroy any registration of electors made pursuant to this law and those to which it is supplementary, he shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. —. If any officer or person employed to make such registry shall falsely and fraudulently make the same, he shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. —. If any officer of an election held pursuant to this act, and the acts to which it is supplementary, shall allow persons not registered to vote, or shall refuse to allow registered electors to vote at such elections, such person so offending shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any officer of an election held under this law, and those to which it is supplementary, shall give a false and fraudulent certificate of election, he shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission. If any officer of such election shall refuse or neglect to make due and proper returns thereof to the proper authority, he shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any person shall for the purpose of voting furnish an elector who cannot read the English language, at any election held pursuant to this act and those to which it is supplementary, a ticket which such person shall represent to such elector as containing a name or office different from the one printed or written thereon, such person shall be fined and imprisoned, or either, for every such offense, at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any person shall fraudulently cause or attempt to cause any elector, at any election held under this law and said acts, to vote for a person different from the one he intended to vote for, such person shall be fined and imprisoned, or either, at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any elector shall vote more than once at any election, or shall knowingly hand in to the election officers two or more tickets together, or having voted in one township, precinct, or county, shall afterward on the same day vote, or attempt to vote in another township, precinct, or county, such person shall be fined and imprisoned, or either, at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any officer of an election shall attempt to induce by persuasion, threat, or reward or promise of the same, any elector to vote for any person, such person shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any person, not having the legal qualifications of a voter at any election under this law and said acts, shall vote or offer to vote at such election, he shall be fined and imprisoned, or either, at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any person shall use any threats, menaces, force or any corrupt means, at or previous to any election held under this law and said acts toward any elector, to hinder or deter such elector from voting at such election, or shall directly or indirectly offer any bribe or reward of any kind to induce any elector to vote contrary to his inclinations, or shall on the day of the election give any public or private treat or entertainment, or authorize any other person to do so, to obtain votes for any person, the person so offending shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — If any person shall in any manner, by fraud or violence, attempt to prevent the operation of this act and those to which it is supplementary, he shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of a military commission.

SEC. — The fines that may be assessed against persons offending under this act and said acts shall not be less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and the imprisonment shall be not less than six months nor more than one year.

SEC. — It shall be the duty of the officers detailed to carry into effect this and the acts hereinbefore named, upon receiving information of any offense abovementioned, to report the same to the district commander, who shall at once convene a military commission for the purpose of trying the offender.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to a question of order. Are all these amendments pending?

The SPEAKER. There are only two amendments pending, namely, those offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. COBURN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to accept my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I decline. I made a promise yesterday, which I cannot violate, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer a mere verbal correction in the second section. I desire to strike out the words in the ninth and tenth lines, "to appoint another person in the stead of the officer or person so removed," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to assign any officer or enlisted man under his command to the duties of the person so removed." I do not want the commander to have power to put civilians in command, only military men.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now demand the previous question. I decline to allow any further amendments to be offered.

Mr. BUTLER. As I understand this matter, if the previous question be ordered no amendments will be in order excepting those that have already been submitted.

The SPEAKER. They will not be.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the main question; and also to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that when the committee appointed by this House to report for its consideration whatever they might deem needful to the execution of the law of reconstruction, had made a report that adhered to the legislation of the Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses, it would have met with no serious objection from gentlemen on any side of the House. I had hoped that a spirit of patriotism in the consideration of this great question would have risen above the spirit of party, that gentlemen would have forgotten in this supreme moment of the Republic that they were Republicans or Democrats, and would have remembered that they were Americans—only Americans—having but one Constitution, one country, and one destiny.

I stand here to strip off the disguises of mere partisans who object to giving to the people of those ten disorganized States, lately torn and distracted by armed rebellion, the power to speak for themselves, with the consent of a triumphant, compacted, and organized nation. Is the nation's will to be disregarded? Sir, instead of meeting the question in the spirit of patriotism, gentlemen come here and present themselves in the unenviable character of the mere eater-up of syllables, or snapper-up of unconsidered trifles. That is the quality of the speech to which we have listened this morning from the learned and scholarly gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

The honorable gentleman has spoken eloquently of the ancient time; he has dwelt upon the dead past and forgotten the living present; he has spoken in classic phrase of Salamis and Plataea; of Marathon and Thermopylae; the glorious recollections of which he has garnered up and reproduced for our instruction, but he has forgotten, sadly forgotten, the imperishable memories dear to the thinking head and beating heart of the loyal millions of this land, which rise from the fields of Shiloh and Stone river, from Chickamauga and Kenesaw, from Antietam and Gettysburg. Ay, the gentleman can speak of the perished republics of pagan antiquity, of their trials and triumphs, but is forgetful of the grander, nobler, and more enduring triumphs of republican America, the living and we trust enduring hope of the world!

Having offered his glowing tribute to the perished republics of Greece of three thousand years ago, the learned gentleman grows eloquent over the Magna Charta which the barons of England six hundred years ago wrung from the trembling hands of an imbecile king; but he has no remembrance of that nobler Magna Charta which Washington, whom the gentleman professes to revere, wrung from the hands of another king, the American Constitution, the supreme law of the land, the revered charter of the liberties of the great people whom we this day represent.

I submit, sir, with all deference to the gentleman, that he has spoken in a narrow, partisan spirit-unworthy of his great attainments and of the people who accredit him as their Representative.

Why, sir, the gentleman with his acknowledged learning, with the experience which he has derived from travel and from observation among men, strange as it may appear, did not notice the marked difference between the Magna Charta of England, to which he referred, and the Magna Charta of the United States of America, as written in your Constitution in words so plain "that the wayfaring man cannot err therein." The gentleman read from the Magna Charta of England, that "no freeman shall be taken or disseized," &c., "but by the judgment of his peers and the law of the land;" forgetful of the fact that the words "no freeman" were words of limitation, and limited this great charter at the time it was adopted to one half the population of England, and forgetful also that these words of limitation were swept away by the Constitution of the United States, in which it is declared that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." By that great law of ours it is not to be inquired whether a man is "free" by the laws of England; it is only to be inquired is he a man, and therefore free by the law of that creative energy which breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul, endowed with the rights of life and liberty. It is not to be inquired, sir, when any man invokes the majesty of American law in defense of his rights, whether a European, an African, or an Asiatic sun looked down upon him when it pleased God to pour the first beam of light upon his understanding. Before that great law the only question to be asked of the creature claiming its protection is this: Is he a man? Every man is entitled to the protection of American law, because its divine spirit of equality declares that all men are created equal. Under the Magna Charta of six hundred years ago, of which the gentleman speaks, the inquiry was not whether the person was a man, but whether he was a freeman by the laws of England!

The gentleman having proceeded in this manner to dispose of this bill, it is not surprising that his argument, before he got through with it, should prove, as it did, a felo de se, not worthy, I would say with all respect to the gentleman, either of himself or of any member of this House. What does the gentleman say? Why, that you are disfranchising white men. Disfranchising them how long? During the temporary period which may be occupied in reconstructing and rebuilding civil institutions in the places which the men so disfranchised have desolated and blasted by their infernal treason. And allow me to inquire what number of those traitors, sir, are disfranchised? Not more than twenty-five thousand, all told, out of a million and a quarter of freemen in the ten insurgent States. By what instrumentality has it happened that even this temporary disfranchisement was made? I answer, sir, by the action of the gentleman himself and the party coöperating with him. The gentleman and his party having insisted that this disfranchisement should be put into the bill, I voted for it, and I stand by it to-day. In saying this I cast no reproach upon any gentleman who originated this provision of disfranchisement as a measure, not of vengeance, but of caution and security.

Having said this much in answer to the gentleman's argument, let me inquire when those States shall be restored as provided by this law, what restriction will then remain on the exercise of the elective franchise? None whatever. The gentleman, sir, discoursed eloquently against denying to this mere handful of men, who have covered themselves with treason and perjury as with a garment, a voice in the preliminary work of reconstructing those States. Yet, strange to say, in the very next breath he denounced as infamous this proposed legislation on the part of the nation to give to the whole people a voice hereafter in the control of their own local affairs. That is what makes this legislation dear to the American people; that hereafter the great body of the people, all being free by the will of the nation, shall have a voice in their local affairs, even those who heretofore have conspired for the overthrow of the Government. They are all by this law permitted to vote after the restoration of those States, by the very terms of the original acts of this Congress and of the preceding Congress, and of the bill now pending, supplementary thereto. This being so, it does not become the gentleman to mouth about democracy and the rights of a free people, and then arrive at the absurd conclusion that the minority in the State of South Carolina must hereafter and indefinitely control and govern the overwhelming majority of its natural-born freemen without giving them vote or voice in the enactment of their own laws.

Sir, I remember how eleven years ago, when I rose in my place within your own hearing, when we were both entering upon the discharge of our duties here as Representatives of the people, and asked whether a government which denied to the majority of its own citizens a voice in its affairs was republican within the meaning of that term as embodied in the Constitution of the country, explaining more fully my meaning by saying, "Is it republican for a minority in a State to take away from an overwhelming majority, of like age, sex, and residence, resident in such State, any vote or voice in the government?" and you doubtless remember the audible response which came back from the Democratic ranks that day from a gallant Representative from Kentucky, who said, "By the living God! no such States that should be permitted to be anywhere on the earth." I stand with that Kentuckian to-day. I think that the majority ought to rule, subject to the equal right of the minority to the same rights with themselves, without regard to color. That constitutes a republican state, and that is the whole question involved in all this legislation. Gentlemen who oppose such a rule of equity and justice can hardly lay claim to the once proud title of Democrat. That is a strange democracy which asserts the exclusive right of the minority to rule.

But, say gentlemen, "you are exercising tyranny over those States." What was just said by the gentleman [Mr. Wood] who also opposes this bill? That the President of the United States appointed civil governors over those States! The gentleman ought to have gone further to make the record perfect, and said that the President had not only appointed governors over those States, but prescribed the terms and conditions upon which the whole people of those States should reconstruct the shattered fabric of their State institutions. I do not stop now to discuss the question of the President's power thus to govern any part of this country. I did say once in my place here that the President had not any more authority to do that than the Czar of Russia when the rebellion was overthrown. But, sir, there was occasion for doing something within the limits of those States for the establishment of law and order. If any gentleman doubts this, I will be obliged to him if he will express the grounds of his doubt.

I repeat it, there was necessity for something being done, and the question is by whom should it be done? The legal governments of those ten States had been totally disorganized and destroyed through the instrumentality of this traitorous conspiracy. There is not a man, sir, within the hearing of my voice who has any respect for the oath under which he is bound here as a representative of the people but will say that from the waters of the Potomac to the waters of the Rio Grande, within the limits of those ten insurgent States, there was not existing at the time when Lee surrendered to Grant a single State organization that had the right to legislate on any subject whatever. And why, sir? Because the Constitution of your country on its face absolutely forbade it. Why? Because the Constitution declares as a condition precedent to any legislation in any State of this Union that every legislative, executive, and judicial officer therein shall be bound by oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and that every State shall have a government republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof.

There was not on the day of the surrender in one of those States a single State officer bound by an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; on the contrary every officer therein had taken an oath to overthrow that Constitution. I do not stop to talk about the rights of disorganized States, and disorganized too by reason of their own treason. The simple fact was and is, and no sensible man in America can deny it, the people of those States by their treason had succeeded in overturning and annihilating their preëxisting State governments, and were simply disorganized communities within the general jurisdiction of the United States and subject to the laws of the United States. Something had to be done to restore them. In this work of restoration the nation had first to be consulted. Before restoration and preparatory thereto, security, irreparable security, for the future was to be taken by the nation—the freemen of organized constitutional States who had crushed rebellion and maintained through their organized loyal States American nationality. American nationality never existed otherwise, and while your Constitution stands never can exist otherwise than through organized republican constitutional States of the Union.

Every Representative upon every side of this House has thus declared, under the obligation of his oath, that the national will is exclusively declared by the Representatives from organized States in Congress assembled. Who is there here to say that any but loyal organized States within this Union can rightfully elect a Congress and legislate under the Constitution for the people of every State and Territory? There is no other power that can make national laws under the Constitution, either for the organized or the disorganized States, for all legislative power granted by the Constitution is vested in Congress. This Congress of the Constitution submitted to the people of the organized States an amendment of the Constitution as the basis of restoration and future security. The loyal people have acted upon the amendment so submitted, have ratified it, and demanded its acceptance by the several disorganized States as a condition of their restoration to political power.

By this action the people have decided, in fact and in law, that the provisions of the pending bill and of the acts to which it is supplementary, which but provide the means for the acceptance of the constitutional amendment and the reorganization of republican governments in conformity therewith in the late insurgent States, shall be carried into effect. Let it be borne in mind that the people of twenty-one of the twenty-seven States represented here have solemnly ratified the Fourteenth Article of amendment to your Constitution, which declares upon its very fore front that all persons born in this country, irrespective of color—

"Are citizens of the Republic, and that no State of this Union shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; and the Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce this provision."

Sir, it is the nation's expressed will that this article of amendment shall be a condition of restoration. Let gentlemen beware how they attempt to stand this day in the way of the execution of the declared will of the nation. Human ingenuity cannot torture the bill upon your table and now under consideration into anything else than an act to carry into effect this declared will of the people. How, say gentlemen? By a military despotism? No, sir; through the instrumentality of the army of the Republic, which under God saved the nation's life. If that patriot army cannot be trusted, in God's name who can be trusted? That is the question I want gentlemen to answer.

The jurisdiction and authority of the nation in a disorganized state, disorganized through its own voluntary treason, is as exclusive as is the national jurisdiction in the District of Columbia; and Congress therefore may pass whatever laws may be necessary, not inconsistent with natural justice and right reason, for the purpose of aiding the people of the insurgent States peaceably and speedily to reorganize local constitutional State governments. I admit that none but the people resident in those States can reëstablish a government, but they must establish it under the law of the nation and in accordance with the will of the nation. That being done they will be restored to their full place in this Union of States, whose people are one, and restored, too, upon a basis, thank God, which will make a like rebellion in all the hereafter absolutely impossible.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I had promised to allow the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] fifteen minutes of my time, but having been so encroached upon in several ways I shall ask him to be content with ten.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope I may not be limited to ten minutes. I certainly understood that I was to have fifteen or I would not have accepted any.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. At the time I made the arrangement I did not know that I should be so encroached upon.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, Mr. Speaker, by grace we live, move, and have our being. [Laughter.] It is by grace I am allowed ten minutes of time to speak against this abominable bill. I hope that I am not irreverent in returning my thanks to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for this gracious gift. [Laughter.] I am disappointed and embarrassed, certainly, by not having the fifteen minutes agreed for. I cannot, therefore, enter into any thing like a discussion of this measure or say what I had intended.

I cannot now stop to argue (though the question is involved in any proper discussion of this or any like measure) that the States to which this bill is intended to apply are still of right legally and constitutionally States in this Union. That they are is as undeniable as that the Union itself is still in existence. If they are not living States in the Union, saved and preserved to it by the war, then all the blood shed and treasure spent within the last six years was in vain. To me the Union of the Constitution is a living, ever-inspiring idea—a vital fact, an undestroyed and indestructible entity—composed of all the States that ever formed a part of it, and utterly incapable of being or enduring without them. And, if living States in the Union, they are entitled to every privilege, every right, which the Constitution provides for any State.

But it is proposed by this bill to declare all the governments of ten States void, absolutely void, and to leave ten million people without a constitution of government, without laws, without courts, without, in fact, any prescribed government whatsoever! Was there ever so unheard of, so monstrous a proposition? Most crimes have names, as murder and treason, but this is a crime too shocking to be named. And yet the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] in advocating this bill declaims of American Magna Charta, of constitutional right, of liberty and law. Sir, this bill is at war with every principle that underlies this Government, and at war with every principle of civil liberty intended to be secured by our Constitution. It surrenders and destroys Magna Charta, whether American or British, and loads down the Anglo-Saxon with a load of chains and oppressions that no Anglo-Saxon can bear without dishonor, without disgrace. It makes a continuous war upon a people who have been overthrown and disarmed, and holds them in the grasp of military power in time of peace, without right, without justice, and in a manner never resorted to, except for purposes of punishment to harass and distress an enemy.

Gentlemen who advocate this bill have much to say about justice. What is meant by justice? Is justice only to be applied on one side? Are we alone to determine what is justice between ourselves and our neighbors? The very fact would be injustice to them? Prostrate and powerless, their necks beneath the feet of their oppressors, the chance of justice is small indeed.

But as the original bills were intended to accomplish all the purposes of this, why denounce this particular measure? Ay, sir, this declares what the others intended, and what this Congress did not dare to express or avow. Audacity has grown with indulgence. Corrupt exercise of power has increased the lust of power, and emboldened you to claim as legitimate what, less practiced in the vice, your silence admitted was usurpation. With what agonizing struggle between conscience and party has the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] come to see in this bill "American Magna Charta," justice and liberty regulated by law? What has brought him in harmony with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER?]

How much more harmonious and expeditious would have been the action of the central caucus directory of fifteen if the gentleman from Ohio had have bowed his meek and lowly head at the beginning as he does now—if he could have seen at the first "American Magna Charta" in a bill declaring the governments of ten of the States of this Union absolutely void, and per consequence the States as such destroyed?

This is an extraordinary session of this Congress—an extraordinary occasion, it is claimed, has called for this extraordinary bill. This is the only measure to be acted upon; the resolution of the House excludes all other legislation; and the necessity of this is charged upon the President. Now, I ask what has he done? He vetoed the bill, and it was passed over his veto. But what has he done to impede or obstruct the purposes of the act? Did he assign bad men to the command of the several departments, or even to any one of them? There has been no such complaint by the majority of this House even up to the present moment. What, then, has he done to obstruct or hinder the accomplishment of the purposes of the act or the purposes you had in view in its passage? Has he made any order or promulgated any command calculated to do any such thing? If so, what is it and to whom was it given?

But you say the Attorney General has given a construction to the act which circumscribes or limits the authority of the commanders of the departments. I answer the department generals had asked for advice upon the act. You had passed the bill as usual under the operation of the previous question, thereby prohibiting all debate and all proper consideration of the measure, and these generals had doubts about its meaning; they differed in opinion upon it, some construing it one way and some another. The President, as was his duty, referred these requests to the Attorney General, the law officer of the Government, for his opinion and advice. He considers it carefully and gives his opinion. And, sir, who of this House has denied or even dared to criticize one of his conclusions? No lawyer here has ventured to put himself in opposition to that opinion. And I venture the opinion that, so far as they had considered it, one half of the Republican members of this House agreed with the Attorney General's opinion of the law at the last session. I appeal to the honorable gentleman from the Pittsburgh district of Pennsylvania, and the honorable gentleman from the Cleveland district of Ohio, than whom there are no abler lawyers on that side of the House, if they had any opinion at the time that bill was under consideration that we were by it directly or expressly conferring the enormous power upon these military departmental officers of removing at their will and pleasure a governor of a State or a judge of a court? Was it supposed that the little satrap at New Orleans was, under that bill, to make and unmake governors, judges, and mayors? Who of us dreamed that such things could be done except by gross abuse of power, by usurpation?

It might have been expected from the merry-andrew of that department as an act of unauthorized military power, but who believed it was conferred by the act? Under what provision was it thought to be granted? Where do you find it? There is no such language as you employ in this bill to express and confer it. The President has not interfered even as I think he ought. He has not turned the usurper—the insulter of his superior, his supreme commander—out of office, or even turned him over to a court-martial for trial. All is going on there as though this officer had law and right and justice in his administration, and for all he is doing and would do.

But the great wrong of the President is found in the fact that he ordered the time for the registration in the State of Louisiana to be extended till the 1st day of August. What if he has? Does that delay or impede or obstruct the execution of the act improperly or unwisely? The act provides for extension till the 1st day of September, and this bill to any day prior to the 1st day of October. But what has the harlequin of the Louisiana department done himself in the way of extension of the time for registration? He, who claims the opinion of the Attorney General and the extension of time to the 1st day of August by the President opens a "broad macadamized road for perjury and fraud to travel on."

By a telegram dated New Orleans, June 18, General Sheridan informs General Grant at Washington that he has extended the registration in the parish of Orleans until the 30th of June, and that he will extend the time in some of the other parishes until the 10th of July. This seems to have been done on his own motion and without order from the President. It seems to have been done, too, when the subject was known to be under consideration by the President and the Attorney General:

Received 12:45 p. m.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, June 18, 1867.

GENERAL U. S. GRANT,

Commanding Armies of the United States:

I have the honor to report that I have extended the registration in the parish of Orleans until the 30th of June, at which time registration will be closed in this city. In the State there are now eighty thousand (80,000) voters registered, which indicates that the registration in the State is nearly completed. In 1860 the vote of the State was fifty thousand, (50,000). I will extend the time until tenth (10th) July in some of the parishes where the population is large, so as to give no just grounds for complaint. I have to say again that the registration throughout the State has been harmonious, the boards having been kindly received everywhere.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Major General Commanding.

And, sir, before any reply to the above is sent to him he extends again the time to the 15th day of July throughout the State of Louisiana, as will be seen by his own telegram to General Grant, dated the 21st of June, and received on the same day in Washington:

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH.

Telegram received at War Department.

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, June 21, 1867.

From New Orleans, June 21, 1867.

GENERAL: I have extended the registration in the State of Louisiana until the 15th of July. I consider the registration now nearly closed, but deemed it best to give fifteen days grace. I wrote you some time ago about the necessity for additional funds. Some will be necessary, but not as much as I expected. My expenses so far are only thirty-six thousand ($36,000) dollars. Our system has been very complete, thorough, and economical.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Major General United States Army.

General U. S. GRANT,

Commanding Armies United States.

Now, sir, let it be observed that it is on this same 21st day of June that the order of the President to extend the time till the 1st day of August is telegraphed to General Sheridan. By this order it will be seen that so far as the extension of the registration is concerned the "broad and macadamized road for perjury and fraud" is opened by himself to within fifteen days of the time fixed by the President, and this, too, by his own voluntary act:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 21, 1867.

Major General SHERIDAN,

Commanding, &c., New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your telegram to General Grant, proposing to close the registration in New Orleans on the 30th of this month, and at some other places in Louisiana on the 10th of July, has been submitted to the President, who is of the opinion that the proposed limitation of time for registry will be too short for a full and fair registration, and that electors in your district should be allowed until the 1st of August to register themselves, especially as it is not probable that the registration in other districts will be completed before that time. He therefore directs that the registry be not closed before the 1st of August, unless there be some good reason to the contrary, which you will report for the President's information and judgment.

By order of the President.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Sent 1:30 p. m.

The Adjutant General will transmit by telegraph the foregoing instructions to General Sheridan.

By order of the President.

EDWIN M. STANTON,

June 21, 1867.

On the very next day, the 22d day of June, after General Sheridan had extended the time to the 15th July and the President to the 1st day of August, is published or sent, or at all events dated, the telegram of Sheridan to General Grant, which has been the real cause of this session of Congress, and which to this day has never been, as I am informed, officially communicated to the President, which is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
NEW ORLEANS, June 22, 1867.

GENERAL: I am in receipt of a telegram from the President, through Brevet Major General Townsend, Adjutant General United States Army, directing me to extend the registration in this city and State until August 1, unless I have some good reasons to the contrary, and ordering me to report success and such reasons for his information, and also stating that in his judgment this extension is necessary to full and fair registration, and that the time should be thus extended because other district commanders will not get through before that time. My reasons for closing registration in this city were because I had given the city two and a half months, and there were no more to register. I have given the State two and a half months and registration will be exhausted by that time. I did not feel warranted in keeping up boards of registration at large expense to suit new issues coming in at the eleventh hour. The registration will be completed in Louisiana at the time specified, unless I am ordered to carry out the law under Mr. Stanbery's interpretation, which practically in registration is opening a broad macadamized road for perjury and fraud to travel on. I do not see why my registration should be dependent on time when other district commanders get through. I have given more time for the registration of Louisiana than they propose to give in their commands, for I commenced six weeks before they did. I regret that I should have to differ with the President, but it must be recollected that I have been ordered to execute a law to which the President has been in bitter antagonism. If after this report the time be extended, please notify, and it will be done. I would do it at once, but the President's telegram was conditional, and there is sufficient time left to issue the necessary orders.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Major General United States Army.

General U. S. GRANT, Washington.

Can any reasonable man now find any excuse for General Sheridan's hesitation to comply with the order of the President to extend the time to the 1st day of August? It added only fifteen days more to the time which he had voluntarily given. Could there have been any other motive but to set himself up, his huge self, against the President? But it is not until the 29th of June that he concludes to obey, as will be seen by the following telegram:

Received 6:40 p. m.

UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
WAR DEPARTMENT.

[Cipher.]

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA,
June 29, 1867—11 a. m.

GENERAL: The registration in the State of Louisiana will be continued, in obedience to the orders of the President, unless I receive further orders from him to the contrary.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Major General.
General E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. Speaker, I have no words with which to characterize that communication to General Grant. It has never up to this time, as I am informed, reached the President, except through the public papers. It exhibits a wanton and deliberate determination to insult his superior officer, the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of this great nation, or a shameful ignorance of the meaning of the language employed. There is, as we have seen, no excuse for it. It must forever disgrace its author in the estimation of every honorable and high-minded officer of the Army and every lover of the military profession. It is in my judgment an act of insubordination which, if not satisfactorily explained and apologized for, should by the judgment and sentence of a court-martial banish him from the military service at once and forever.

Mr. Speaker, "President on the brain" is a very bad disease, and wonderfully prevalent at this time. It attacks heads one would scarcely suppose had brains enough to be inflamed. It is less likely to prove fatal perhaps on that account. It is this disease I presume that makes this bedizened military genius cut such fantastic tricks in his department, play the little corporal, insult his superiors, and endeavor to show his consequence and importance by insubordination. And this, sir, is the officer that this House honors by its vote of thanks. Thanks! what has he done to entitle himself to thanks in the conduct of his office in his department? Who knows what he has done or what he has left undone? Has he made any report of his proceedings? Who has seen it, and what does it contain? Upon what did you base this cheap and empty compliment? What reasons has he given for his removals from office and his appointments to office? What cause existed for his high-handed and illegal operations; his playing shuttle-cock with the judges, mayors, and Governor of a great State? Make him President, and the lessons you are now teaching him will be practiced upon yourselves. His capacity eminently fits him to be a tyrant, and lord it over superior men. Make him President, and his lofty head will swim so that he will play harlequin with all the variations.

But, sir, by what right or authority do you make this military general, great or small, the legislative, executive, and judicial power of a great State? You talk of conquest. The conquest you are claiming is not alone of the territory of the Republic. Your subjugations are not alone of its citizens, or of those who have wronged the Union and incurred your hatred and malice, but you are subjugating the Republic, the Constitution, civil liberty, and all that to the freeman makes life desirable or even tolerable. Your triumphs are not alone over fallen and conquered enemies, but you are triumphing over the fall of your country, over the destruction of the States that compose the Union, over the destruction of the essential, the underlying principles of republicanism, over civil government. History declares the Roman republic ruined itself by its triumphs, the excesses of its conquests and power. Rome, the mistress of the world, when enslaved by tyrants and oppressed by military governments, had reason to deplore the success of its arms, and to look back with regret on those happy times when its power did not reach beyond Italy, or even when its dominion was almost confined within its own walls. Like Rome may we not when too late have occasion to regret our excesses, our conquests, our military governments, our oppressions? May we, in yielding to the demands of party passion, to political malignity, and the animosities engendered by our recent struggle, not find that we have lost our Constitution and the free government it was intended to secure?

Mr. ROBINSON obtained leave to have printed, as part of the debates, some remarks upon the pending bill, which will be published in the Appendix.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has now remaining twenty-eight minutes of his hour.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I trust that in that time I shall be able to state the position which I hold to be the correct one with regard to this bill, without attempting to answer the various remarks which have been made by gentlemen on the other side.

I confess, sir, that a small portion of the blame with reference to the acts of the President since we adjourned, may be attributed to Congress, in that it used improper language in the acts heretofore passed. And this, it appears to me, was owing to an indistinct conception of the condition of the territory for which we were legislating. If we had then all agreed, as we have since, that the States that were lately in rebellion were conquered territory and as such subject to the power of this nation, and had treated them accordingly, we should have had very little trouble in reconstructing government in the South upon the principle of the admission of new States. But, sir, we were not all perfectly agreed in our understanding of the laws of nations as applicable to this question; nor is it wonderful that we should thus have differed, when even some of the judges of the Supreme Court have differed in their opinions upon this subject. I will state what I suppose to have been our real position.

The nation was afflicted with a civil war which for a time was an insurrection. Some twelve million of the inhabitants of the country claimed that they no longer belonged to this nation. They set up an independent government. They established all the machinery of government, both of a national government and of States under that national government. They raised large armies to defend their pretensions. We, at the period when we declared against them a blockade, admitted them to be, not an independent nation, but an independent belligerent, rising above the rank of insurrectionists, and entitled to all the privileges and subject to all the liabilities of an independent belligerent. The nations of Europe so treated them. We so treated them in our dealings with prisoners of war. In short, there could be no doubt of the fact.

We were, then, at war as two independent nations; and it depended upon the will of the conqueror whether the defeated party should be treated merely as a vanquished nation, or whether we should, in addition, punish them as individuals for the violation of the sovereign rights of the nation. We conquered. What did we conquer? We conquered the confederate government. We conquered all the States forming the confederate government. We conquered a government that had been erected and maintained by those who declared that they owed no allegiance to the Government of the United States. For these conquered rebels to pretend that they had any rights under a Constitution which they had thus repudiated and attempted to destroy, and that the States which had been arrayed in hostility to the nation were still States within this Union, as asserted to-day by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], seems to me a bold absurdity. Yet that was the doctrine of the President. That is the doctrine which some gentlemen maintain here.

Under military law we treated them as conquered provinces. What is the law with regard to provinces conquered from a foreign independent belligerent? When you conquer territory from a foreign nation or an independent belligerent, the territory thus conquered is governed by military power, by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, being in this case the President, until the legislative power of the nation shall have spoken and directed what laws shall govern. But the moment the legislative power of the nation interposes the military authority ceases to have sway, and the Commander-in-Chief has no more to say in regard to this matter than a corporal of militia. He is to do just what the legislative power orders him to do, and he can do nothing else.

A great deal is said about the President acting as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Until he was superseded in his authority by Congress I have no fault to find with his maintaining military rule in the South. But he assumed to exercise legislative powers; he assumed to establish governments; he assumed to appoint civil officers; he assumed that these conquered provinces should come back at once to the enjoyment of all the rights of loyal States under the Constitution, and be entitled to all the privileges which they had possessed prior to their rebellion. Now, sir, as I said before, nothing of this kind came within the power of the Commander-in-Chief. What is the duty of the Commander-in-Chief? If Congress sends an army to quell the Indian war in Nebraska, what is the Commander-in-Chief to do? Congress orders that army to go there. It raises and equips the army. What do the officers do? They pass no act of legislation; they go there and order the troops when to charge and when to retreat; they drill them; they put them through military exercises. But they can do no act that looks like regulating the object of the war or the object with which the army is sent there. Why, sir, the Constitution of the United States makes express reservation of all such power to Congress. It expressly declares that Congress shall have power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." The Executive has nothing to do with it; the judiciary have nothing to do with it. Congress is the only and the controlling power. Congress has enacted the rules and articles of war. Could the President of the United States interfere with those? Could he add new articles, new rules, new regulations? Certainly not. The military officers that were sent as commanders in the States were simply appointed as agents of Congress. To be sure, the original bill provided a military supervision simply, and we had intended to follow it up with a law putting reconstruction into the hands of civilians. That is what I should have been disposed to do now, (and I had prepared a bill with that view,) using the military simply as a police and appointing civilians to reconstruct. But if Congress chooses to take officers of the Army and assign them to this duty, they then become the agents of Congress, and neither the President nor any officer under him has any right to interfere or do anything but execute what Congress commands.

Now, sir, it being reduced, I think, to a plain proposition that Congress is the only power that can reconstruct and reclaim these outlying States, the President had no right to call upon the Attorney General or any other officer of the Government to interfere in any manner in such reconstruction. There is but one appeal, and that is either to the agents appointed by Congress or to Congress. It has been well decided in Dorr's case that all power on this subject is vested in Congress. But, sir, we need not look to any such decision. It ought to be known before this time by the President of the United States—it is known, I trust, by the scholars in every colored school in this District—that the Constitution of the United States does not apply to any Territory. The States are parties to the Constitution; they are the contracting powers; they are the substantive body. Territory, however, acquired by purchase or conquest or by inheritance is the property only of that substantive power, of that power bound up by the Constitution, and that power alone is governed by the Constitution, but does not extend for any purpose into any Territory or conquered province. Why, then, talk about the Constitution regulating the action of Congress in a province, in a Territory, in a conquered State, whether conquered from a legitimate State or an illegitimate State?

I may be asked how we would treat the confederate States of America? Just as Congress chooses. They are our property; their citizens are our subjects. Their lives, their liberties are subject to the supreme will of this body, always controlled by the laws of nations, the laws of war, and the laws of humanity. There is no other power on earth; there is no branch of the Government; there is no power in the Government, except what I have mentioned, that has any right to interfere or to say one word on the subject. If you wish to punish the malefactors for violated majesty, that is another matter. Possibly you might do so through your courts of justice. At least you might attempt it, but I do not suppose you can do it. But there is one thing clear: that territory not being yet declared by Congress to be in a state of peace or restoration is under the military authority of the Government, and any tribunal constituted by the military authority, any military tribunal, any court-martial can try any one of those who belonged to the belligerent forces. Jefferson Davis, or any man of the army of the confederacy conquered by us, is this day liable to trial by military tribunal and to sentence. Mr. Speaker, while I would not be bloody-minded, yet if I had my way I would long ago have organized a military tribunal under military power, and I would have put Jefferson Davis and all the members of his cabinet on trial for the murders at Andersonville, the murders at Salisbury, the shooting down our prisoners of war in cold blood. Every man of them is responsible for those crimes. It was a mockery to try that wicked fellow Wirz, and make him responsible for acts which the confederate cabinet was guilty of. Of course they should be condemned. Whether they should be executed afterward I give no opinion. I would carry out such punishment as, in my judgment, the justice of the country required. I would carry it out through the legal tribunals that I have mentioned, and which are as much the legal tribunals of the land as the Supreme Court of the United States. That is my view exactly of what would be logical.

As to the question of confiscation, I think that a man who has murdered a thousand men, who has robbed a thousand widows and orphans, who has burned down a thousand houses, escaped well if, owning $100,000, he is fined $50,000 as a punishment and to repair his ravages. I said before that I was not in favor of sanguinary punishments. I trust, in saying that, that I need not be supposed to condemn them when they are necessary. For instance, the clamor that has been raised against the Mexican government for the heroic execution of murderers and pirates, [applause,] that clamor finds no favor with me. I think that while they have gone far enough, (though not half as far as they might be justified in going,) yet there is no law nor policy under heaven, and no sense of justice that will condemn that great, heroic, much-enduring man who for six years has been hunted with a reward upon his head, has been driven from one end of his empire to another until he got to the very borders, who has no parallel in history that I know of, except it be William of Orange, who was driven from island to island, and from sand patch to sand patch by just about as bloody a persecutor as was to be found in Maximilian when he decreed that every man warring against him should be shot down without further trial. I am not going to shrink from saying that I think such punishment proper. I do not say, nor do I ask that anybody should be executed in this country. There has got to be a sickly humanity here which I dare not get along side of for fear I might catch it. [Laughter.] And it is now held by one of the most liberal and enlightened gentlemen in the country—I mean Gerrit Smith—that we should even pay a portion of the damages inflicted on the rebels, and pay a portion of the rebel debt. [Laughter.] I shall come some day to have an argument with Horace Greeley about that, and he will explain it, therefore I need not say anything further. I believe I have said enough to explain my views on the subject, and now I ask for a vote on the question. [Applause.] I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURR, Mr. GETZ, and Mr. MARSHALL obtained unanimous consent to publish remarks on the pending subject as part of the debates, which will be published in the Appendix.

The first question recurred on the following amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa; which was agreed to:

Insert as an additional section the following: And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall prevent, or attempt to prevent, the execution of this act, or either of the acts to which this act is supplementary, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The next question was on the adoption of the following amendment, offered by Mr. BENJAMIN:

Add to section three the following: Provided, That the right of any person to be registered as a legal voter shall in no respect be changed or affected by virtue of any pardon granted to such person by the President of the United States for participation in the rebellion.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 81, not voting 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Calkins, Chubb, Clark, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kitchen, Koons, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polesky, Price, Kaum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Sylvester, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James E. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—119.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Phelps, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Broomall, Cornell, Coyode, Dodge, Fox, Haight, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Laflin, Lincoln, Mallory, Morrell, Pomeroy, Pruyn, and Van Wyck—18.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS L. JONES.

The Speaker laid before the House the protest of M. M. Benton and others against the admission of Thomas L. Jones as a member of Congress from the sixth congressional district of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

JOSIAH L. SIMPSON.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, the papers in relation to the claim of Josiah L. Simpson for relief were withdrawn temporarily from the files of the House.

ELECTION CONTEST—KENTUCKY.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in each of the cases of contested election from Kentucky the time for taking testimony is hereby extended to the 1st day of December next, in all things else conforming to existing law, except that such testimony may be taken before a notary public.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear some reason for extending the time so long, leaving the State of Kentucky in the mean time unrepresented, especially as I hear it intimated in high places that we may be called together again in October next. If such a session should be called, Kentucky will still be a State substantially out of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania perhaps does not understand the scope of the resolution. It has no reference to the matters referred to the committee yesterday touching the parliamentary question of the right of these parties holding certificates to seats. It is only touching those cases in which there is a contest that it is proposed to extend the time. The question of the disqualification of these persons holding certificates is a question to be examined by the committee independent of the taking of testimony, as is covered by this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to know of the chairman of the committee whether the practical effect of his resolution will not be to keep out these members from Kentucky until such time as the testimony which he proposes to admit, by an extension of the time, shall come in.

Mr. DAWES. It is with no reference to that question that the resolution is offered.

Mr. RANDALL. But will not that be the effect of the vote on the resolution?

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it can have that effect. The resolution is offered independently, and the decision of the committee as to the qualification or disqualification of these members will not depend upon it. The testimony taken under the resolution will not at all affect the judgment of the committee on the question to which the gentleman refers. No testimony taken in reference to this point will reach that question. Certainly the committee had no desire in directing me to offer this resolution to postpone for one hour or for one minute action on that question, nor had they or I any idea that it would have any bearing upon that question.

Mr. RANDALL. I am satisfied with the explanation made by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but I desire to say that it is not just in my opinion that even this possible action should take place in the committee in reference to this matter.

Mr. DAWES. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that he does not disagree with me or with the committee upon that point.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope their action will be so speedy that the question cannot arise.

Mr. DAWES. I hope so, too; and I now renew the demand for the previous question on my resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MUNGEN. I wish to ask whether that resolution applies to any other member from Kentucky than those whose seats are contested in regular form?

Mr. DAWES. It does not; it applies only to those whose seats are contested. I move now to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAWES. I have been asked by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. NICHOLSON] to withdraw the objection which I made to excusing him from further service on the Committee of Elections. I do so now, but with a renewal of the expression of the regret which I feel at his withdrawal from that committee; but from what he has stated to me I cannot further ask the House to insist on refusing to accept his withdrawal.

The question was then taken on excusing Mr. NICHOLSON from further service on the committee, and he was accordingly excused.

FRAUDS ON THE TREASURY.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish for the information of this House any report or reports on file in the Treasury Department regarding alleged frauds on the internal revenue in the fifth collection district of North Carolina.

MESSENGERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized and directed to retain the messengers and employees during the recess of Congress who were authorized to be retained during the last recess.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the resolution adopted at the last session was broad enough. If any difficulty arises on the subject hereafter we can remedy it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to discuss the question; but it does seem to me this is about as good a time to offer the resolution as any other will be.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection to the resolution is that it may imply too much.

Mr. LOGAN. It is limited to the same number as was proposed in the preceding resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD COMPANY MAIL MATTER.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, when appointed, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing railroad companies to carry their own letters relating to the business of their roads outside of the mail, free of postage, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTY.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House what further legislation, if any, is necessary to facilitate the payment of the additional bounty granted by act of July 23, 1865.

And thereupon, on motion of Mr. MUNGEN, (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CAKE: A petition of Pennsylvania soldiers entitled to additional bounty, numerously signed, praying Congress to appoint a committee to investigate the cause of the delay in paying said bounty.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia: The petition of Minerva Roberts, asking the payment of pension from the date of her husband's death to the time of filing her application.

By Mr. SCHENCK: A petition of 400 citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying for amendments to the reconstruction laws, and for greater security to loyal people in the southern States.

By Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of 4,000 citizens of Maryland, in favor of universal suffrage.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of Ira McIntyre, of Kalamazoo county, Michigan, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying for a pension. Also, affidavits of various persons accompanying the same.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. JAMES DIXON, of Connecticut, and Hon. THOMAS A. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, appeared in their seats.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of a resolution offered by me the other day in reference to the rule of the Senate which was adopted last Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate postpone all other business—

Mr. SUMNER. There is no business before the Senate, as I understand, to be postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not know whether there is or not. Petitions, &c., I believe, are first in order. However, that makes no difference. The question is, whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Is there any objection to proceeding to its consideration?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I wish to be heard on the question of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution. What I have to say—

Mr. HOWE. I hope we shall proceed with the regular transaction of business.

Mr. DIXON. Are petitions in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions are not in order, because there is a motion to proceed immediately to the consideration of the resolution named by the Senator from Massachusetts; and that is the question under the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER on Monday last, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate adopted the 5th of July last limiting the business of the Senate be, and hereby is, rescinded.

Mr. SUMNER. Now the question is on proceeding with the consideration of that resolution, and what I have to say will be directed to that point. I have to submit that the resolution was adopted last Friday under a misapprehension, and it is in order to meet that misapprehension that I shall call attention to a debate that once occurred in this Chamber.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order, whether on a motion to take up the resolution it is competent to refer to a debate that once occurred in this Chamber, and as to whether the resolution of Friday was adopted under a misapprehension or not.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is now whether we shall proceed with its consideration, and I am going to assign reasons for proceeding with its consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question is not whether you shall proceed to its consideration, I submit to the Chair. The question is whether you will take up the resolution for the purpose of proceeding with its consideration. It is not before the Senate; and I raise the question of order that the Senator cannot discuss it or the reasons for its adoption until it is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I have to say—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is to be decided, in the first instance, by the Chair without debate. I suppose it is in order for the Senator to give the reasons why we should proceed to the consideration of the resolution, and I do not know why, as part of his argument, he may not refer to the fact, or to his apprehension of the fact, that the other resolution was not properly considered, or that it was adopted under a misapprehension. It seems to me that it is in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit that if he goes on to show that the resolution was adopted originally by a misapprehension he is giving reasons for the adoption of this resolution, and is going into the merits of the question whether the resolution should be adopted. I think it has always been the understanding in the Senate that on a motion to take up a Senator could not go into the merits of the question proposed to be taken up. He can give his reasons for asking to take up the measure, but he must confine himself briefly to the reasons for taking it up, and not go into the merits of the question to be taken up, to say that it ought or ought not to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe that the Chair has never excluded anything as being out of order for irrelevancy in the Senate of the United States. My recollection of it is, that anything that a Senator thought was relevant was in order. The Chair does not assume to judge of his argument, whether it is relevant or not. I do not think we have ever excluded anything as being out of order because it was considered by the Chair irrelevant. I think I remember very clearly that on a motion to take up the Chair has admonished Senators that they should speak pertinently to that issue and use short arguments. I believe that has been advised from the Chair, but I do not know that the Chair has ever undertaken to direct what the argument shall be.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inquire of the Chair, then, if a motion to lay the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, to take up this resolution, on the table would not be in order?

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not, because I have the floor, and the Senator cannot make the motion while I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only difficulty. I suppose it would be in order if the Senator had the floor for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Chair recognized me as having the floor on the question of order, and that question having been decided by the Chair, I was still upon the floor; and whether the Senator from Massachusetts can hold the floor over the question of order and retain it is another question.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course I can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that.

Mr. SUMNER. I am astonished, Mr. President, at this singular effort to cut off discussion on an important proposition. I am at a loss to appreciate it. I cannot enter into the motives of it. I cannot fathom them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state in a word exactly the reason.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not be long; I have no desire to occupy time. I merely wish to set myself right, and, as a Senator, to contribute to set the Senate right on an important question.

It was stated the other day that Mr. Clay had brought forward in this Chamber in 1841 a proposition in the form of a resolution determining the subjects on which the Senate would act during what was then known as the called session under the administration of Mr. Tyler. I will not quote that resolution at length; for it was read at the time, and will be found in the Journals of the Senate. The Senator who called attention to it then proceeded to remark, as follows:

"That resolution was not acted upon; it was displaced by the course adopted by the House of Representatives."

I read from the Globe of our first day's proceedings the statement that the resolution of Mr. Clay was displaced by the action of the House of Representatives. Now, by a reference to the Globe it will appear that that is an entire misapprehension. The resolution of Mr. Clay which was invoked as a precedent for our proceeding was not displaced in any such way. It was displaced by another proposition of Mr. Clay, which he himself, after the opposition from the other side of the Chamber, was forced to abandon as being in spirit unconstitutional; but it was a proposition which was in no sense so unconstitutional as that of ours. The proposition that was quoted the other day as introduced by Mr. Clay was brought forward on Monday, June 7, 1841, and left to lie on the table. On the next day Mr. Clay—and the Globe will show that the suggestion of the proposition was made to him by another Senator—brought forward this which I will now read:

"Resolved, That when the Senate adjourn during the present session, leaving a subject under discussion and undecided, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed at the next meeting of the Senate, immediately after the journal is read and petitions and reports are received, without waiting for the usual hour of one o'clock."

That was left on the table of the Senate. I understand from history that Senators on the other side had a meeting to determine their course. An eminent gentleman, associated in sentiment with the other side of this Chamber at that time, has called my attention to the fact; and that may be inferred from the statements that were made in the Senate when the resolution was called up by Mr. Clay, as it was on Saturday, June 12. Congress had already then been in session some time: this was the second week. As soon as it was called up, Mr. Benton made a very brief speech, which is thus set forth in the Globe:

"Mr. BEXFON objected to the resolution, as going unnecessarily to change the rules of the Senate, and to shut out resolutions and calls of inquiry. It would cut off the only source of information now open to the minority for a right understanding of the management of the Government. It seemed to be an attempt to cut down and shut out inquiry in a way not hitherto known to Congress. He was firmly opposed to any cutting down in this manner any privilege of the Senate. It showed a determination to dictate to the Senate its order of business and the duration of the session. If it was persisted in, he would at least demand the yeas and nays."

"Mr. CLAY replied, insisting upon his equal right to submit resolutions with that of other members of the body."

And went on in that key.

Mr. YOUNG, a Senator, I think, from Illinois—

"Heartily concurred with the Senator from Kentucky in his desire to terminate the session at as early a day as possible, but did not think it necessary to make an alteration in the rules."

That, again, brought Mr. Clay forward, who made another speech not unlike the first, and somewhat in tone like those to which we listened the other day. Mr. Benton then followed. He said:

"That the adoption of this new rule would cut off entirely all calls upon the Departments for information, which was necessary to a discharge of their legislative duties. It was something quite new for Senators on one side of the Senate to prescribe limits in this manner as to what calls they should make for information."

A suggestion was then made by Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, and then Mr. Buchanan made some brief remarks, of which I will only read a sentence:

"Mr. BUCHANAN thought the resolution unnecessary. There was a courtesy among the members of that body which rendered it always easy for gentlemen to accomplish their wishes as to the order of business."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That debate was all on the second resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I so stated that it was on the second resolution. There was no debate on the first resolution. Then Mr. Calhoun made his protest:

"Mr. CALHOUN observed that the principal means by which a minority could guard its rights was the observance of the rules of order. He submitted to gentlemen whether it was fair thus to cut off their opponents from an opportunity to bring out the expression of their opinions on every important subject—yet that would be the whole effect of the proposed resolution."

I do not read the rest of Mr. Calhoun's remarks. That again brought forth Mr. Clay, who said that—

"He wanted no other or better evidence than the present discussion was affording of the disposition of their opponents to protract debate."

I introduce these words of Mr. Clay now, because it makes more remarkable the abandonment afterward of his position. Then came Mr. Calhoun again in reply to Mr. Clay:

"Mr. CALHOUN said that no man on that floor could be more anxious to be at home and attending to his business than he was, but he did claim, in behalf of the minority, that they should be heard. He denied that the people demanded from them action alone. They demanded that they should act wisely."

"The attempt thus to cut off debate was a thing unprecedented in the Senate. He should resist it. Anxious as he was to be at home, he would remain here a whole year rather than not be heard. He moved to lay the resolution on the table, but consented to withdraw the motion at the request of Mr. Allen."

Mr. Allen made an elaborate speech to which I simply call attention, and will read only a sentence or two. He says as follows in the course of this speech:

"But I hold that the announcement by the Senator from Kentucky of his July adjournment, and his laying down to us the measures which are to receive our action, is a form of legislative despotism which should be resisted at the threshold, in its very first stage."

He then goes on, after making his protest at great length, to say:

"I hope the Senator will let the question on this resolution go by, and that he will not exert his paramount influence in forcing such a restriction upon the Senate. But if he presses his resolution to a vote, I can tell him that he will have to sit here many a long and sultry night. There are eighteen of us on the one side and two others, who on this point will unite with us, and that makes twenty. All of us can talk 'some'—all of us, from the youngest to the oldest, can and will say something."

Then followed a suggestion from one of Mr. Clay's intimate supporters—Mr. Bayard, of Delaware—of a modification of the amendment, which Mr. Clay declined at that time to receive. Mr. Calhoun then renewed his motion to lay on the table, on which the yeas and nays being called, there were 19 yeas, being the Senators in opposition to the resolution, and 27 nays, being Mr. Clay and his supporters. When that had been done, Mr. Clay, apparently recovering his senses, and possibly thinking somewhat of the Constitution, remarked as follows:

"Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, replied that he really wished to see the business of the Senate done in the manner most agreeable to gentlemen on all sides of the House. If gentlemen would be content with having one hour assigned them for their calls on the Departments and other resolutions, very well; he for one would assent to such an arrangement."

"Tokens of assent being given—
"Mr. CLAY said: If the Clerk will follow me, I will dictate a modification, though I do not like to be a dictator in any sense."

"Mr. BUCHANAN. You do it so well, you ought to like it."

"Mr. WRIGHT. That's fair."

"And the words 'that's fair' were repeated in various quarters."

"At the suggestion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, Mr. Clay further modified the resolution by adding the words, 'unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.' And the resolution in its finally amended shape was then adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, That during the present session, at the expiration of one hour after the meeting of the Senate each day, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the subject left unfinished the preceding day, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate."

And this is the precedent of the Senate of the United States applicable to the present occasion. Now, for the first time in our history, you have undertaken to put a limitation upon the business of this body. It is a precedent which may be grateful to some of you who are now in the majority; but I know full well that it would be anything but grateful to you if you were in the minority. I have done my duty now in calling attention to the past; and I do most respectfully submit to my associates in this body the expediency of rescinding a resolution which I cannot but think was adopted under a misapprehension, with an idea that there was some color of precedent for it in our past history, when in point of fact there is none.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say simply that the proceedings which have been read and the motion which has been commented upon by the Senator from Massachusetts were not referred to at all by me or by anybody else in any previous debate. All that matter has been brought up by the Senator; and the proceedings of the Senate and the final conclusion arrived at read. He said that he would show that what I said the other day with reference to a certain precedent was not correct; but thus far he has not attempted to show it. I simply stated that Mr. Clay made a certain motion with regard to the business of the Senate to be attended to at that session, and that that motion was not afterward pressed to a vote. There was the length and breadth of my statement. If I said anything more—

Mr. SUMNER. I have it here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator oblige me by reading it or giving it to me?

Mr. SUMNER. I will read it when the Senator is through.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will hear it now, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator had done me the honor to listen to me when I opened this matter, he would have observed that I read from the Globe, and of course I could not do the Senator injustice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not hear what the Senator read.

Mr. SUMNER. I said that a Senator—and I held a copy of the Globe in my hand, but I did not even allude except in that general way to the Senator from Maine—I said that a Senator had commended at the beginning of the session some proposition like that which was finally adopted by the Senate, by calling our attention to a supposed precedent of 1841, and that the Senator, after reading a resolution at that time introduced by Mr. Clay for the purpose of limiting the course of business, went on to remark as follows. I now quote from the Globe the language of the Senator from Maine:

"That resolution was not acted upon; it was displaced by the course adopted by the House of Representatives."

The inference of course was, that so far as the Senate was concerned, that resolution of Mr. Clay found no disfavor; it was displaced by action in another House. Now, I have shown from the record that it was displaced by action in this body; that the very day after Mr. Clay introduced this first resolution he introduced another and different one, which was in the nature of a substitute, and intended as a substitute; and that, after debate in this Chamber, he was obliged, substantially, to abandon even that substitute by consenting to its modification so far that it amounted to very little as a limitation of debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my recollection does not fail me, the Senator, if he looks a little further forward on the Journal, will find that on a subsequent day Mr. Clay called up his original resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot find it here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may be mistaken about it; but that is my recollection.

Mr. SUMNER. It was never called up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We will see. [After examining the Journal,] I do not find that it was; but the subsequent action was on the resolution referred to by the Senator; so that I am not right in that particular. But, sir, I should like to know how it appears that it was displaced by the other resolution. I stated that it was displaced, as I supposed. Of course it could only be a supposition, nothing appearing upon the record of the Senate of the resolution which was adopted by the House of Representatives, and which was read by me. I might be mistaken about that, of course; and there is no very particular consequence to be attached to that fact one way or the other. The point I endeavored to make was, as against the idea that it was unconstitutional for us, by resolution, to prescribe what business should be done: that Mr. Clay had offered a resolution of a certain character doing that very thing. I was only stating my own impressions about it. I read it without any further comment than that it was displaced by a resolution adopted by the House. That resolution, adopted by the House, limited the business to be done by the House, and in its effect it controlled the legislative action of the Senate, because it was of no use for the Senate to act on what the House would not act upon and had agreed not to act upon at all. The whole matter, therefore, in my judgment, is immaterial.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one point, and that is, that in all he has read from the Globe as a matter of argument against the resolution to which I alluded or any resolutions offered by Mr. Clay nothing was said by any member of the Opposition of that day as to the unconstitutionality of such a rule. That idea is original entirely with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. In all the opposition which was made by Mr. Benton and Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Buchanan, their constitutional scruples, nice as they were, did not come up to the point that it was unconstitutional for Congress to say what business it would do at a particular session, and what it would not do. Therefore I think that the argument of the Senator on that point must be conceded to be his own, to rest upon nothing but his own reading of the Constitution and his own idea of the spirit of it. What I endeavored to show was, that the matter had been attempted before in one branch of Congress and carried into effect in the other branch of Congress, and without any idea that thereby there was an infringement of the Constitution of the United States. Why, sir, in my judgment, I repeat, it is a mere matter of business, and, as I said on a former occasion, it is a matter with regard to the propriety of which, and as to the responsibility for which, each individual must judge for himself. The opposition that was made to the proposition of Mr. Clay, finally adopted as modified, at that time was that it cut off the minority from acquiring information that they might desire from the Departments. Our resolution, as we have adopted it, does no such thing. It merely specifies what legislative business shall be attended to, leaving open all the ordinary proceedings with reference to obtaining information or making inquiries. That this resolution is not objectionable to the minority, so called and so understood, is proved by the fact that I believe every one of the minority voted for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. "The minority" is on your side. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. That there is a minority on our side of the Chamber does not make it out that the rights of the minority are particularly infringed. Otherwise, we can pass no resolution and no vote, make no rule and no law at any time that is disagreeable to some half a dozen members. Why, sir, when should we get through legislating, what should we accomplish at any session of Congress, if that rule were adopted? It prostrates the great majority of the body on both sides of the Chamber at the feet of a few individuals who are grieved in the result of a vote, unless the honorable Senator from Massachusetts deems that he in fact is the majority, and that nothing must be done that is disagreeable to him! When we take a vote and find twenty-seven or twenty-eight on the one side and half a dozen on the other, the result may be considered as a fair expression of the will of the Senate. I think, on the whole, there are no such dangers to the body-politic as are apprehended, especially if the majority voting for the proposition embraces all of one side of the House and nearly all of the other.

Now, sir, I do not believe that the Senate voted under any misapprehension. I think I had a pretty tolerably clear idea of what I was about at the time; I have no doubt my associates had; and I think they are quite as capable of judging for themselves of the effect of a vote, and quite as able to take the responsibility of that vote, as anybody else. I, at any rate, am quite satisfied that I acted under no misapprehension, and am ready to act again in the same way.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to protract this discussion. I have done simply my duty in calling attention to the past precedent which had been introduced into the discussion. When it was introduced I had no means of replying to it. I had not the Journals or the Globe with me; and I had supposed from the statement made by the Senator from Maine that it was a resolution practically adopted in this Chamber. I was not aware of what followed. I was not aware of the extent to which the whole spirit of the proposition was denounced. Nor was I aware that its original mover, Mr. Clay, was obliged to abandon his proposition; that he magnanimously, and justly, and considerately abandoned it. That is the true precedent in this body; and that is the precedent which I now submit it would be better for the Senate to follow; nothing, surely, could be lost by following it. The resolution adopted by the Senate on Friday, while it remains, will only be of evil example. If hereafter quoted as a precedent, it may be at last for some purpose of oppression, when Senators will not all be as just as those whom I now have the honor of addressing. It may be seized then as an engine of tyranny. For one, sir, I would leave no such weapon in this chamber to be seized hereafter by any hand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we can have a vote on the resolution I shall say nothing.

Mr. FESSENDEN, [to Mr. TRUMBULL.] Move to lay it on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has never been taken up yet. I hope we shall have a vote on taking it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts for consideration.

The motion was not agreed to.

PETITIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate will indulge me, I desire to present two petitions that I have received. I do not know but that to do so trenches upon the rule, if any gentleman wishes to raise that question. I will do my duty, however. I have a petition here from a lieutenant in the Navy, who represents that he has done a great deal of service to the country and is entitled to a pension. It will be laid on the table for further consideration.

I have another petition from W. W. Holden, of North Carolina, who sets forth that he has always been a Union man, and prays that the Senate will remove the civil disabilities under which he labors. That will also lie on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 131.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 131) to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. WILSON to the second section.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senate consents to proceed at this early moment to the consideration of this bill and the amendments that are pending thereto. The peculiar views taken by the Attorney General of the United States of the reconstruction acts of Congress, and the apprehension of the members of this body, at least of the majority, that the President of the United States in the execution of those acts may or will be governed by the conclusions to which his legal adviser has arrived, have doubtless been the great causes for the reassembling of Congress on the 3d of July instant. I propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes while I pass in review some of the arguments of the Attorney General respecting the meaning and intent of the two reconstruction acts already in existence. I do not believe that upon any just and fair construction of those acts there was any necessity for additional legislation, whether in the shape of amendatory, supplemental, or declaratory acts. I believe that the acts themselves contained all that was necessary for carrying out the policy of Congress in regard to reconstruction, and that if they had been properly construed, if correct advice had been given to the President of the United States as to their true purport, we should not probably have been under the necessity of assembling here at Washington in the Capitol to spend a portion of the hot days of this intense summer.

To ascertain the nature and extent of the powers given the district commanders we must look carefully at the language of the statute, and must not overlook, as others have done, the reasons and the circumstances impelling Congress, as they plainly announce, to the enactment of so unusual a system of legislation.

The act of March 2 declares in the preamble that in the ten States there exist "no legal State governments, and no adequate protection for life and property." Governments of a certain kind did, it is true, exist there as a matter of fact. They were such governments as had been established, not by Congress, the supreme law-making power of the nation; not by the loyal people of those States, acting freely and by spontaneous impulse for the whole community, as was the case in West Virginia; nor yet by the rebel people acting freely; nor by the rebel and loyal elements acting conjointly; but by the orders and decrees of the Executive, acting without the knowledge and consent of Congress. That functionary, suddenly elevated to his high position by the assassination of the President elected by the people, acting under the influence of bad principles and bad advice, and seizing upon a most critical state of affairs produced by the surrender of the rebel armies, took upon himself the task of State-maker for the ten rebellious States, now devoid of all State rights and privileges, and, as he himself had often declared, lying so many heaps of shapeless political ruins. He assumed, of his own will and pleasure, without any act of Congress, and in utter derogation of their constitutional powers and duties, to grant to those populations not merely that military protection which by the law of nations and war is an incident to military occupation of an enemy's country, but political rights and powers as States; to clothe them with legislative authority, with administrative and judicial functions, and the additional right of electing Senators and Representatives to Congress. All this he did without law or constitutional warrant, in a manner and spirit unknown to our history and known only to despotic Governments. It was the first earnest and formal attempt to introduce practically into our Government those absolutistic ideas, the absence of which from our system has ever been our boast and our true glory.

It cannot be denied—even he cannot and will not deny—that he exercised unlimited power, political and legislative, over the subdued States. It cannot be denied that his object was to introduce into Congress at once and immediately on its next assembling, in December, 1865, the Representatives of constituencies hostile to this Government, hostile to its preservation, hostile to its policy, its principles, its duties, with no security for their future good behavior but the promise on oath of men who by tens of thousands had once wantonly broken their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States! It cannot be denied that his scheme was to reinstate the rebels in all their former powers and privileges under this Government without exacting from them any substantial security against a recurrence of the rebellion, and without introducing into the Constitution proper safeguards against their malign influence for the future. But by far the most glaring and menacing feature in his policy was the bold assumption of absolute power over a field of legislation exclusively belonging to Congress—to reframe a ruined, dissolved State—to pass it through a political resurrection and reinvest it with full State powers. In the prosecution of this scheme he was, of course, involved in the violation of the laws of the United States. But he persevered, and having, by his arbitrary proceedings—all in the interest of the rebels—secured the election in those States of men who seven months before were in open rebellion against us, he came before us and addressed us these pompous and insulting words: "Gentlemen of the Senate and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it now remains for you to pass upon the qualifications of the persons thus elected under my policy!"

Congress, not yet prepared to acknowledge a master, and least of all such a master, and not yet prepared to give the right hand of fellowship to the bloody hand of treason, spurned the suggestion, and gave him and his protégés to understand that there were certain preliminaries to be settled before such an intimacy could be reestablished. They expressed their views in the form of what is known as the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which they submitted for the consideration of the several States, as prescribed by the Constitution. Had it been adopted by the requisite number of State Legislatures the rebel States would to-day have been represented in Congress; but this nascent absolutism, restless and insolent here as elsewhere, interfered and arrested the good work of reconstruction. By its patronage and intrigues it redoubled the discontents of the South. It absurdly claimed the right to veto the proposition. It resorted to all the arts of low demagoguism to defeat it. It foolishly held out false hopes to the people of the South and amused them with the delusive promise that the northern people would reject the measure and return to these Halls men who would favor the absolutistic policy of Mr. Johnson and his advisers, and who would impose no conditions upon rebellion, but admit it at once to its former place and power.

The whole power and patronage of the Executive were brought out and used to make good this childish and hollow promise. The Executive himself, on his journey to attend the funeral ceremonies of Douglas at Chicago, plainly told the throngs that listened to him that the offices in his control should be given to those who would advocate his policy. He openly set them up at auction, and agreed to bestow them for partisan influence and votes. The bait was caught. A Johnson party was organized. The appointees of Mr. Lincoln who declined to sell their principles were mercilessly thrust out of office. A general system of espionage and surveillance was organized against them, and they were ousted from their offices because they would not, on hearing the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music, fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. Honest and competent men, whose fidelity was never questioned, were unceremoniously exchanged for the venal and the base, and a wide-spread office brokerage inaugurated itself throughout the land, with its numerous bureaus and branches in every State and in almost every county, in the shape of Johnson committees and other almoners of Johnson's patronage. This patronage was boldly and unscrupulously employed as the lever by which the party who had carried the Government safely through the war was to be overthrown; and, to its amazement, that patriotic party, though it had drenched the rebel soil with its best blood and lavished billions of treasure in saving the Government from the clutch of treason, now heard itself denounced by the Executive as a band of traitors, because it would not fall down and worship the image. Their Congress was denounced by the aspiring King Theodore as an unconstitutional body, hanging on the verge of the Government. Threats were made by his advisers to disperse them by military force, and he was manifestly contemplating the rash attempt, not dreaming that half a million bayonets were thirsting to punish him should he actually make it. So confident had his brief possession of power made him that his chief minister had ventured in his presence, in a speech he made to the people of a northern State, to predict that he would make himself king if his policy as a State-maker was not carried out—a subtle flattery worthy only of the minister of an Oriental despot! But this reckless breach of the Constitution, this endeavor to introduce absolutism and rebellion into our politics, soon exhibited its legitimate fruits in the bloody streets of New Orleans, in the unpunished murder of Union men by the tools of Johnson, and in other acts of violence and wrong, for which he and his advisers are responsible before the world and before high heaven.

But the wicked pretension of making States and governing without a Congress was sternly rebuked by the loyal people at the elections of 1866. Their voice pronounced sentence upon the usurpation and warned its authors to return to duty—to return to constitutional ideas and abstain from their wicked efforts to strip Congress of its powers and govern half of our national territory by executive decrees. The warning was not heeded. Blind with rage at the party who, guilty of the fatal mistake of trusting to his professions, had chosen him for Vice President, he persisted with angry and defiant obstinacy, with an assumption of infallibility in his interpretation of the Constitution and an ostentatious profession of conscience and patriotism, in adhering to his policy of executive State-making, refusing to see or believe that his despotism was every day exposing the Unionists, white and black, of the South to ruin and destruction, or if he did know the real truth winking at, if not encouraging, the wrongs they were receiving at the hands of the rebel authorities to which his cruel policy had subjected them.

He directly interfered to dissuade and prevent his pseudo governments of those States from ratifying the amendment, determined to use them as so many trumps in the partisan game he had inaugurated against the party he had joined and betrayed, to be made available for him in the presidential canvass of 1868. He did not want them to owe their reintroduction into the Union to the party that had successfully fought down the rebellion, and which, for some reason not yet known to the world, he had wantonly betrayed. He preferred to have them remain out of the Union, unrepresented in Congress—scenes of disquietude, agitation, mischief-breeding, to remain as his policy made them, theaters of lawlessness, insecurity, crime, anarchy, where life, liberty, and property are governed by the law of the stronger—scenes for the display of his love of absolute power and his skill in low party tactics, rather than that they should owe their restoration to the legislation of a Republican Congress and honorably accept honorable terms of settlement. What those unfortunate States needed was the protection of law, so that industry could rise in the morning, perform her task, and in the evening retire to rest without molestation, secure of her reward and perfectly confident of the like safety in the future. They wanted order and a cessation of strife and contention. The interests of all required this. Agriculture, commerce, education, morals, religion, all cried out, give us law, rescue us from anarchy, cease contention, give us quiet! But the Executive said no, you shall have disquiet, you shall have contention, anarchy, so long as Congress disents from the superior wisdom of the Executive, so long as they refuse to recognize the principles of absolutism that I have set up. I am your king, you are my provinces, and I shall govern you by royal proclamation. No matter though industry may languish; no matter though the bands of law are loosened and your persons and property are the prey of unavenged murder and plunder; no matter though the hearts of the wise and the good among you tremble at the state of dreadful insecurity that exists among you and the dark prospects of the future, I am he who holds your destinies in his hand; I must be obeyed; I am the infallible judge of the Constitution; I have unrolled it; I understand it; I am conscientious; Congress and the so-called loyal people are not conscientious; I am patriotic; they are not; they are traitors; I am great; they are small; they must be put down; I must be put up; and you must remain in your present condition until I have had my way. And thus the matter stood until the second session of the last Congress, when the two Houses, losing all hope of securing his cooperation in the work of reconstruction, and seeing that the experiment he had launched more than a year before had fallen utterly short of all the objects of a regular government and was daily becoming worse and worse in its operations, interposed and passed the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, of March 2, which was vetoed and repassed by the requisite majorities. And finding in their grapple with the absolutism of the executive department that mere inducements and persuasions were unavailing, they finally exercised their powers as State-makers, and in the supplemental act allowed the black man to vote—allowed it not perhaps more out of regard to the principle of equality than as a measure demanded by the necessities of the times and as a means of neutralizing and finally extinguishing the power of the secession leaders in those States. Absolutism again resisted, and vetoes and speeches laden with insult and ridicule were plentifully hurled at us. Such a provision was, forsooth, a perfect overturning of the constitution, which left to the States the right to say who might vote and who might not. The rebel States had not lost this right by the war; the right was imperishable and still fresh and vigorous; and although we had overcome and overrun them by our arms and held them in the iron grip of military occupation, still we could not take from them the precious right to exclude the negro from voting, notwithstanding they had no government at all under which even a white man could lawfully vote. Absolutism cried aloud that it had already reconstructed those States, and had—as was in fact the case—excluded the black man from suffrage, thus assuming a political and legislative power not granted to the Executive. It did not the less, however, complain of the violation of State rights, as if it were possible and not utterly preposterous and ridiculous that State rights could be granted, imparted, or restored by the President of the United States alone!

I have briefly sketched the motives of Congress for passing these acts and the circumstances, all of the most public nature, which led to it. It became the duty of the President to see that they were faithfully executed. His obligation in this respect was the same as in other cases. They establish another and different kind of government from those instituted by the Executive in the ten rebel States. They first divide them up into five districts, Virginia being the first, North Carolina and South Carolina the second, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third, Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth, and Louisiana and Texas the fifth. It declares that they shall be made subject to the military authority of the United States as afterward prescribed in the act.

The Attorney General has given this statute an elaborate consideration, and has come to the conclusion, and has so advised the President, that this military authority is not paramount to that of the State, but that it is only auxiliary to it; that it is a mere police power, sent there by Congress to aid in preserving the peace and enforcing the local State laws, whatever they may be; and that it cannot override the local law enacted by the State government instituted there by Mr. Johnson; consequently, that the military commander has no authority to remove from office any State functionary appointed or elected under the State laws. This announcement has, beyond doubt, been a principal cause of the appearance of a quorum of the two Houses in their seats on the 8d of July, the day to which Congress adjourned.

The argument submitted by the Attorney General to the President has certainly taken the country by surprise. Such a construction of the act is, I believe, entirely original with him. I am bold to say it was never thought of by Senators or Representatives in Congress, whether they voted for or against the bill. Indeed, had such been supposed to be its effect, there can be no doubt that all the affirmative votes would have been given in the negative and all the negatives in the affirmative. Had such been held to be its true intent and meaning there is no reason whatever to suppose it would have encountered the President's veto. That veto, on the contrary, declares in terms too strong to leave any doubt that Mr. Johnson and his advisers were then of the opposite opinion. The veto message, speaking of the powers given to the district commanders and endeavoring to present it in an odious light, uses this language:

"The power thus given to the commanding officer over all the people of each district is that of an absolute monarch. His mere will is to take the place of all law. The law of the State is now the only rule applicable to the subjects placed under his control, and that is completely displaced by the clause which declares all interference of State authority to be null and void. He alone is permitted to determine what are the rights of person and property, and he may protect them in such way as in his discretion may seem proper. It places at his free disposal all the lands and goods of his district, and he may distribute them without let or hindrance to whom he pleases. Being bound by no State law, and there being no other law to regulate the subject, he may make a criminal code of his own, and he can make it as bloody as any recorded in history."

It is understood that the present Attorney General, if he did not write this veto message, assisted in its preparation. Being the law officer of the executive branch of the Government, it is to be presumed the President consulted him, and that he would never have sent in so important a message without his full and free concurrence; for the main questions raised by it were questions of law, and not of administration. He is therefore, in every sense, as responsible for the veto as for his more recent opinion, and I shall not assume that he desires to shirk that responsibility.

It now, however, turns out that that high-sounding veto—full of indignant reproach to Congress for inviting an absolute military tyranny, beneath which all law and all personal and political rights withered away—was all a mistake. One hundred days of study and meditation convinced the Attorney General, and of course the President, that it was just the bill they wanted. Their labors, aided by Plowden and Dwaris on Statutes, revealed to them the cheering fact that the act, instead of denying the legality of the existing mushroom governments, actually recognized and confirmed them; and that the military authority it established, instead of being that dreadful boaconstrictor which was to swallow up all persons, all laws, all rights, was really and in truth the harmless servant of the Government and laws established by the executive and the guarantor of their enforcement! So sudden a change of front discloses at least the merit of versatility of genius and plastic logic that finds no difficulty in proving from Plowden and Dwaris that Congress meant one thing while they said the contrary.

After providing that those States—that is, the people of those States—shall be “made subject to the military authority of the United States as therein afterward prescribed,” the act proceeds to direct that it—

“Shall be the duty of the President to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the Army, not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.”

This language is plain. The parties made subject to this military authority are the people, and all the people of those States, not excepting any out of the whole corps of officials, from the highest to the lowest, executive, judicial, ministerial, civil, and military. All, without discrimination, are embraced in the category, and made subject to the same authority, for the purpose announced in the preamble—the enforcement of peace and good order. The nature and extent of this authority are as fully and clearly expressed as the language is capable. The military officer is to command the district—that is, the people of the district. This is a military term, and was of course used by Congress in its technical sense. For a military officer to command a community must in all reason imply his right and power to subject them, in all their affairs, to military or martial law, to which the civil law must, whenever he requires it, give way. It becomes the paramount rule, and the orders of the commander are supreme and irresistible so long as they fall within that code. It is the law of necessity, and the existence of the necessity must from the nature of the case be judged of and determined by the commander. Giving to him the command of these people must, if language has any meaning, be held to subject them to this code for the purposes mentioned; and had Congress intended to exempt any of them from its operation we must presume they would have employed fitting terms indicating that exemption; but instead of this we find them using terms of the most general import, and subjecting all classes to the command. And further, foreseeing what was sure to take place, collisions between this military authority and the authority of the State, they expressly, and from abundant caution, declared that “all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void.” It would seem impossible to assert the supremacy of the military authority in plainer terms. But the Attorney General holds that this supremacy covers only cases of insurrection, breaches of the peace, and illegal violence, and not cases of injustice, where the rights of person or property only are concerned. These cases he holds to be exclusively cognizable by the civil courts of the State, and beyond the possible reach of the military authority. His language is:

“[It [the military authority] is given to meet the contingency, recited in the preamble, of a want of adequate protection for life and property, and the necessity, also recited, that peace and good orders should be enforced. This construction [he adds] is made more apparent when we look at the immediate context and see in what mode and by what agency this protection is to be secured. This duty or power of protection is to be performed by the suppression of insurrection, disorder, and violence and by the punishment, either by the agency of the State courts or by military commissioners when necessary, of all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and it is declared that all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of this military authority shall be null and void.”

In his struggle to maintain the narrow theory that the military is but a mere police force, confined to the duty of common constables or triers of offenses against the State laws, the Attorney General overlooks not only the general unrestricted power given by the term “command” in the second section, but the particularized power and duty given in the third section, “to protect all persons in their rights of person and property.” The rights of person and property are not created by State laws. They exist by the law of nature, and laws are made, or should be made, to protect them. Congress declared in the preamble of the act that under the illegal governments inaugurated by Mr. Johnson this protection did not exist, at least that it was inadequate; and imposed upon the commanders the specific duty of affording it by all and any of the instrumentalities implied in the expressions “military authority” and “command,” applicable to the whole people. The Attorney General, using his professional pruning-knife, trims off all the boughs and branches of this general power, leaving nothing but a sapless stock, which he calls a police power; a power merely to arrest and punish rogues and criminals. It is true, the act gives the commander this power as well as the power to protect all persons in their rights of person and property. But the leading error of the Attorney General lies in the assumption that this protection of person and property is to be accomplished by arresting and punishing criminals, and that the power can be used in no other way.

The power to protect persons and property is a power pertaining to all Governments. It is the essential, fundamental power, without which they are not entitled to be regarded as Governments. And this power does undoubtedly and necessarily embrace the power to punish offenders. But it is by no means confined to that. It embraces not only retributive and punitive, part of what we call public justice, but also preventive. It not only inflicts punishment for the wrong which has been already done, but shields the citizen from threatened wrongs; and this use of it is found to be as necessary in attaining protection as actual punishment; so that the language of the third section, “to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals,” is but an enumeration and designation for the purpose of calling the attention of the commanders to those subjects, of some, but not all, of the duties embraced in the word “protection,” those subjects being notoriously the ones most demanding their attention.

The Attorney General observes that the act creates a “new jurisdiction never granted before,” and that it must therefore be construed “strictly.” Even if it were a new jurisdiction, the rule invoked would not apply, because the statute being a remedial statute, enacted to prevent evils of a most serious kind, and to extend legal protection where there was imperfect protection before or none at all, a liberal construction favoring the remedy prescribed and suppression of the mischief complained of is the true one, as would be adjudged by any enlightened court of justice.

But, in fact, the statute does not create a new jurisdiction in the sense in which law writers use that term. We had been engaged in a fierce war with those States. We had conquered them. Our armies occupied their whole territory and we held them by right of military occupation—solely by this right. We could hold them by no other, and to us of course pertained, for the purpose of that occupation, all the rights which successful war confers. They were conquered country from the moment of their surrender, and subject to the will of their conquerors under all the restraints, but no others, prescribed by the law of war. That law, as we all know—as the Attorney General well knows—preserves and protects the rights of person and private property among the conquered people and all their institutions not inconsistent with the laws or the policy of the conqueror. But their political governing power becomes extinct, and the only power of this kind is in the conqueror. It is for the successful government to say what shall be the local law. It has earned this right by the sword; and although its generals in the field may do many things to preserve the conquest, keep the peace, and punish private rapine, it belongs exclusively to that Government as the law-making power to grant and to regulate the political privileges of the conquered people. This in its nature is legislative, not military authority, and, under our limited system, belongs to the Congress of the United States, not to the Executive. The political governments, therefore, which Mr. Johnson assumed to establish were very properly called in the preamble of the act “illegal,” and the act itself was but an assertion of the law of war as the paramount law in those States, creating no “new jurisdiction,” but enforcing and regulating by such details as seemed requisite a “jurisdiction” that supervened on the surrender in 1865, and which Mr. Johnson had in the interest of the rebels themselves struggled to destroy. Here was the beginning of his absolutism. Here was the cause of his rupture with Congress. Congress intended, during this military occupation, the result of hard-fought battles and streams of blood, to secure safeguards against future rebellions. Johnson wanted none. Congress believed that one of the best securities would be to curtail the number of Representatives in the rebel States unless they themselves would allow the emancipated black men to vote. Johnson preferred that the number should be increased, and that the black man should not vote—that he should remain a pariah, without political rights or consideration, except as his presence gave additional political power to his former master.

The great source of the erroneous conclusions of the Attorney General is the notion that those States, though conquered in a war in which they claimed to be belligerents, and were recognized by us as such, still possessed constitutional rights as States of the Union. Hence he speaks of offices existing there which are to be recognized by the United States as State offices, from which the incumbents cannot be removed by the authorities of the United States. But who will pretend that a government absolutely extinguished by conquest can leave behind it any offices or any officers vested with any powers which the conqueror is bound to respect superior to his will? Military occupation and conquest do not leave laws in force or offices in existence. They take the place of both. The governments established by Mr. Johnson are, as to the United States, without validity. We are not bound to respect them. They rest upon no law but the unconstitutional orders and proclamations of their author. They have created, they can create no offices in the constitutional sense of the term, and the incumbents are not entitled to be called or treated as officers, either of the State or of the United States. They are simply private persons performing certain public acts under an invalid and unconstitutional government, having no part, lot, or right in the Government of the United States. It is impossible to argue that such persons are officers of a State, entitled, as the Attorney General contends, to hold their places as against the military authorities of the United States. The government which is the source of their authority has never been recognized as valid by the United States, who, on the contrary have declared them to be illegal, i. e., existing without law. The Constitution provides that—

"Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State; and the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof."

I cannot conceive that any court in a loyal State would recognize the binding effect of a judgment record or the record of any public act emanating from one of the rebel States made by Mr. Johnson; and surely, since the passage of the act of March 2, condemning their governments as illegal, such a court would not be at liberty to give it any effect whatever. They could not hold that the persons certifying were officers of the State, as they are required to be by the act of Congress relating to the subject.

No, such persons hold no "office." They are the mere agents of a usurped, illegal government, and have no constitutional, public character. And should the military commander see fit to drive them from their places he has a right, without any statutory provision, to do so and to put others in their stead, or to leave their so-called offices vacant and void.

The Committee on the Judiciary, in the bill now before us, admit this power of removal and provide for its exercise; but from the clause it contains requiring the vacancy to be filled "by the detail of some competent officer or soldier to perform the duties" they seem to doubt the power of Congress to authorize a civilian, not in the Army, to be put in the place should the commander see fit; and we are told that such an incumbent, appointed by the commander to perform these duties created by State laws, becomes an "officer of the United States," which he cannot be unless appointed by the President as required by the Constitution. They therefore decline to authorize the commander to put a mere civilian into the place, for the reason that it being an office of the United States the appointment to it must be by the President or the head of a Department. But let me ask them, and also the Attorney General, is it any the less an office of the United States when in the hands of an officer or a soldier? Is a soldier an officer of the United States and appointed by the President? Not even all officers of the Army are thus appointed.

But it is vain to speak of such places as offices, either State or Federal. They are neither. An office cannot exist save by a valid law, and under a valid, lawful, and operative government. But if during the military occupation the commander discovers that the functions defined by an extinct or an invalid statute are convenient and useful to preserve order and protect persons and property he may undoubtedly authorize any one, whether subject to his military orders or not, to perform them as his agent or employé; and the only difference between the military man and the civilian is that the former is bound to obey him and exercise the functions, or such of them as he orders to be exercised, while the civilian is not, but acts only by his own consent.

I am therefore unhesitatingly of opinion that General Sheridan acted lawfully in removing Mr. Wells, the reconstructed Governor of Louisiana, and in appointing a civilian in his place, as well as in all other cases of the kind; and I will not, however much I respect the Committee on the Judiciary, consent to pass a censure on that gallant soldier or his brother commanders for doing acts so obviously lawful, by voting against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] allowing the employment of civilians in those places in the rebel States. Besides, the oppressions to which the Unionists there have been subjected under Mr. Johnson's sway, their interest in and knowledge of local officers, present the strongest reasons of a moral kind for employing them in such services.

Ycs, sir, the Attorney General's opinion utterly ignores and casts out of view the legal consequences of the triumph of our arms; and undertakes to construe a statute passed in full recognition of those consequences as if there had been no rebellion, no fighting, no victories on our side, no surrender on that of the rebels. The bloody history of the past and our own legislation correct him; the almost countless gravestones of our slaughtered countrymen correct him; the weeds of widowed mothers, the tears of orphaned children, the crutch of the crippled soldier rattling on almost every northern as well as southern floor, the heavy weight of taxation upon every branch of human industry, correct him and rebuke his blindness.

Sir, I regard, and have all along regarded, the reconstruction legislation of Congress as entirely sufficient to reach the ends which we had in view, and with an Executive at the head of the Government disposed to cooperate with Congress, and to re-establish peace and tranquillity at the South, and to re-introduce the rebel States into Congress upon the principles of justice, there can be no doubt that this session would have been entirely unnecessary, and this plan of supplemental and amendatory legislation now before us entirely supererogatory; and if I vote for this bill, or any other bill of this character giving a construction or an explanation to our former legislation upon reconstruction, I shall do it under the protest and the explanation which I have now made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section two, line eighteen, after the word "Army" to insert "or by the appointment of some other person;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commander of any district named in said act shall have power, subject to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said act shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from, or granted by, or claimed under, any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof; and upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the approval of the General aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army or by the appointment of some other person to perform the same.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I have an amendment which I wish to offer. It is to amend section six, line seven, by inserting after the word "has" the words "while holding any such office or;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary act is (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and who has while holding any such office or afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote; and the words "executive or judicial officer in any State," in said oath mentioned, shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of the general laws of a State.

The object of this amendment is to get rid of a construction that may be put upon the section as it stands now, and which I think it inexpedient should be permitted to be put upon it if we can avoid it. As the section reads now, it is open to the construction that it includes only the individual who shall have engaged in rebellion after having held office. I do not see any reason why those who engaged in rebellion while holding an office should not also be included. I hope this amendment will commend itself to the judgment of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think that the words proposed by the Senator from Missouri have the least significance. I think that is the construction of the section as it is. The section now declares that the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in the act to which this is amendatory is, among other things, that no person who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion, is entitled to be registered. He need not have held the office the full term and afterward engaged in the rebellion; if he has held the office but for a day and afterward engaged in rebellion he is disfranchised by the terms of the section as it stands. It is not necessary that his term of office should have expired. I do not think that there is any necessity for the insertion of these words. I do not think they alter in the least the legal construction of the sentence. It is just multiplying words. It seems to me there can be but one understanding of that sentence. No person who having held an office afterward engages in rebellion can vote. Now, is it necessary that he should have held the office the full term according to that language, and that he should have been out of office before he engages in rebellion? Has not a man held an office when he has qualified and taken possession of it, if it be but for a day or an hour?

Mr. DRAKE. I will state for the information of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that my attention was called to this matter by a very intelligent gentleman from a neighboring State, who stated that the construction which I am now endeavoring to obviate is the very construction which has been put upon that oath in that State, it being there construed to confine its operations and meaning to those who had previously held office, and being out of office at the time the rebellion was inaugurated, engaged in the rebellion. Now, sir, I wish to shut down upon that conclusion. I wish particularly to reach those men who, while holding office, went into the rebellion; and when I state to the honorable gentleman that this construction that I am now endeavoring to obviate has been put upon this oath in a neighboring State, one of the rebel States, I trust that for the mere sake of obviating the introduction into the bill of half a dozen words, he will not feel it necessary to object to making that perfectly clear which, however clear to us in this Hall, it seems is not equally clear elsewhere, and has been used for a purpose very foreign from that which the gentlemen and myself had.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit to the Senator from Missouri whether these words may not lead to confusion, and extend the act beyond what was originally contemplated. Does the Senator from Missouri mean by these words to embrace a person holding office under the rebel government? The terms would apply to such a person, if you are to consider the person discharging the functions of an office at that time an officer. If we adopt the words of the Senator from Missouri he will see that the sentence is open to this construction; that if any person while holding an office, executive, legislative, or judicial, in any State goes into rebellion he is disfranchised. Now, it was not the intention of the original act to disfranchise any but those who held office prior to the rebellion. We have not undertaken in this act to disfranchise everybody who went into the rebellion, but only those who held office and afterward went into rebellion. By that we meant held office under a State government when it was a loyal State government. But introducing the words suggested by the Senator from Missouri would make the section embrace a man who acted as justice of the peace during the rebellion, though he may never have held any office before the rebellion broke out. Does the Senator from Missouri intend to extend the scope of the original act? I presume not; and yet the terms of his amendment might be so construed. It was the intention of Congress to disfranchise from voting only certain classes of persons who went into the rebellion. All rebels are not disfranchised. If that had been the intention, it would have been very easy for Congress to have said that all persons who engaged in the rebellion, who gave it aid and comfort, should be disfranchised; but Congress has not said that. It has said that persons who held executive, judicial, or legislative offices in any State and afterward went into rebellion are disfranchised. That means in any State while it was a State of the Union. They ceased to hold these offices, allow me to say to the Senator from Missouri, when the State rebelled; they were all out of office as State officers when the rebels took possession of those States and set up inimical governments. Therefore the section as it stands is strictly correct. It must embrace every person who held a legislative, executive, or judicial office under any State before that State went into rebellion. We do not intend to embrace any others; and yet I am not sure but that this might be construed, if the words suggested by the Senator from Missouri are adopted, as embracing persons holding office after the State went into rebellion.

Mr. SUMNER. Would there be any objection to that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would be extending the original act. We have acted in the Senate thus far upon the assumption that our legislation would be confined to carrying out fairly the acts as we originally passed them, and I presume the Senator from Massachusetts does not purpose, or the Senator from Missouri does not purpose, going any further than that.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to suggest to my friend that there is reason to believe that the original act is open to misconception, that it is not intelligent, or that it is not construed in the same way everywhere. Does it not belong to us to clear it up, to remove that ambiguity and to make it clear?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly; but I was trying to show that it was an impossibility that such a question as that suggested by the Senator from Missouri could arise, because all these persons who were legislative, executive, or judicial officers of a State necessarily went out of office as executive, legislative, or judicial officers of the State the moment the State went into rebellion. They then set up a government that was not a State government at all; it was an enemy government. They became officers of a hostile government; and if they gave aid and comfort to the rebellion after having been executive, judicial, or State officers under an existing State government they are embraced by the section as it stands; but if you put in the words that any executive, legislative, or judicial officer in any State while holding any such office goes into rebellion, then it may be insisted that that embraces justices of the peace under the rebel government who never held an office under a State government that we recognized as such.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, whether such a construction as that to which the Senator from Illinois refers could be put upon the section, if amended, I cannot say. What I am driving at now is this: the statement is made to me, on what I regard as sufficient authority to justify my action here, that in the State of Virginia they do not exclude from registration those who were in office at the time of the rebellion; but construe it to mean that the individuals referred to in the oath were those who had been in office prior to that time, and then engaged in the rebellion when the rebellion broke out. I am not concerned at all, one way or the other, whether the construction which the Senator from Illinois refers to can be given to the section, if amended, or not. I do not care what construction is put by the registering officers in those States upon the statute that will exclude officeholders under the rebellion from any participation whatever in registration and voting in those States. But no man can say whether such a construction would be given to the section if it should be amended. I say a sufficient ground for offering the amendment, and in my deliberate judgment a sufficient ground for the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee to accept the amendment, is that in this neighboring State of Virginia, where one of the closest struggles will be made between rebelism and loyalty that will be made in any of the rebel States, the construction is already given which I have stated, to wit, that they say that a man who was in office at the time of the rebellion is not affected by this oath at all, but that he must have ceased to be in office before; and the consequence is that thousands in that State who were in office at the time of the rebellion and have never held office before, but that which they held then, are registered and are to be put down as voters to vote down loyal men.

If the Senate does not consider this of sufficient importance to justify the amendment, of course I bow to their decision with all respect; but in my judgment it is of sufficient importance to cut at that very point of rebellion and take out of the registration every man who held office in those rebel States at that time and afterward engaged in rebellion. I want that thing made so clear that there cannot be any mistake about it; and if the other construction which the honorable Senator from Illinois says the section may, if amended, be liable to is put upon it, so much the better; I will thank God for it.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me we ought to make every point clear—not only this, but every one. The question now is on this. The Senator from Missouri has mentioned that his attention has been called to this very question. So has mine. Two different gentlemen, coming from different parts of Virginia, and so far as I know without any concert, have called my attention to this doubt; and one of them, in a letter, makes use of this language:

"I think that at least two thirds of the registers appointed in our State sympathize with the President and his policy, and in some counties not a single straight-out Radical man has been selected. This shows the necessity of having the law so plain that it cannot be misunderstood. There is a constant effort to prove that this or that is not an office within the meaning of the law. Therefore it is of vital importance that an authorized explanation should be had."

That is the statement of one gentleman with regard to the influence that in Virginia presides over the registration. Imagine, if you please, two persons on a registration board hostile to your bill: of course they would give it an interpretation such as would not be agreeable to us. Now look at the terms of the oath on which this difficulty occurs. They are as follows:

"That I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof."

Now, on that language these great doctors find a doubt, and they give the doubt to the enemy. They say that the word "afterward" there limits the application of that clause to persons who held office before they engaged in the rebellion. I presume that no Senator intends that it shall have any such limitation. I know that my excellent friend who drew that oath certainly could not intend that it should have any such limitation. Now, as long as the doubt has arisen, let us remove it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of the amendment, although that is not said to be the purpose of the honorable Senator who proposes it, will be to exclude from the right of voting all persons who have acted in any official capacity during the rebellion. The Senate, of course, are aware that but for the existence of offices of various kinds in those States there would have been mere anarchy. The rights of the loyal men depended upon the existence of some judicial tribunals. The rights of person, as well as of property, depended upon the existence of some tribunals vested with some jurisdiction to protect either person or property; and it was therefore the duty (not a crime, in my opinion) of every man within the limits of those rebel States who received an appointment to an office which looked to the security of the peace of the State to accept it. They stand in the situation in which Lord Hale stood when he was appointed judge by Cromwell. He acted in that capacity after the termination of the reign of Cromwell and the short reign of his successor. There was no writer and no politician in England who did not justify the act as patriotic. He did not approve of that revolution; he did not especially approve of the execution of Charles I; but he deemed it his duty, looking to the interest of the whole nation, to accept an office from that revolutionary government, and he discharged the duties of that office with the ability which characterized his whole official career.

Now, I have no doubt that there are men in these rebel States who accepted judicial station, accepted executive station, and who discharged the duties of both with a single eye to the security of the people of those States, the loyal as well as the disloyal. The honorable member from Missouri tells us that it is not his purpose to disfranchise the class to which I advert, but he at the same time says that if it bears that interpretation and receives that construction after it shall be passed he will thank God for it. Now, I suppose no one, in providing for this session, contemplated the happening of any contingency which would render it necessary for us to meet here for any such purpose, to enlarge the number of persons who are to be disfranchised. That was done, in the judgment of the Senate, sufficiently by the acts passed in February and March; and the public everywhere, who thought that Congress had any authority to legislate on the subject at all, were satisfied with the extent of the exclusion to be found in these several acts. Now, we propose very greatly to enlarge that exclusion, or rather, to speak more correctly, looking to what the honorable member from Missouri says is his object, we propose to adopt an amendment which may lead to that exclusion.

I received to-day—and I think a letter of his was addressed to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate—a letter from General Sickles, in which he urges upon me, if possible, as the policy of the country, especially looking to South Carolina and North Carolina, the States within his district, that so far from adding to the classes who are to be excluded, we should save from exclusion many of those who are now excluded by the terms of the original act. He says—and I have no doubt he says with perfect truth—that there are hundreds and thousands of men in what were called the rebel States who are perfectly loyal now, just as loyal as we are; who have seen the error of their ways, are satisfied that the Government must exist as our fathers made it, a Government coextensive with all the States of the Union, that it never can be separated, and they are, therefore, as anxious as we are to use all the ability that they have in order to preserve it as our fathers intended it should exist. Why should they be excluded more than you have excluded them now? You exclude those who have actually entered into the rebellion, who have given aid and comfort to the rebellion, in the sense in which those words have always been construed; but why should you exclude men in Charleston or men in either of the States who have agreed to accept office in order to preserve the community of which they were members from sheer anarchy, in order to protect themselves, as well as those who, like themselves, may perhaps have been hostile to the rebellion itself. I hope, therefore, that if any change is made in the law, it will not be one which is to enlarge the class to be prohibited from exercising the right of franchise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I think we ought to have a fair understanding of the meaning of this amendment. If it only means this: that all persons who were in office when these States went out are excluded, then it is in accordance with my understanding of the meaning of the reconstruction acts.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is my understanding, too.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to stand upon that understanding. But if it means to comprehend persons who held offices under these States during the rebellion, it is enlarging the list of exclusions; and for myself I do not think it necessary to enlarge the list. I do not wish to depart from the ground we took originally. I think we have excluded enough persons; and I am clearly of the opinion that the friends of the Union, the friends of liberty, our political friends lose as much, or nearly as much, in these ten States by the exclusions already made as anybody else will lose. Some of the warmest and most earnest friends we have in all of these States, the men who are taking leading parts in organizing the friends of these reconstruction bills, are men who are themselves excluded and cannot hold office or vote. They are men who have been compromised by the rebellion, but who have changed their opinions and are now earnest and devoted to the country and to the policy of the Government, and I think they can be trusted. However, I do not propose to change this policy of exclusion now. I do not think we can make this change until these States come into Congress.

I do not think it wise now to add to the list of persons excluded. I cannot vote for any amendment of the kind. I make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary on another point: by the oath taken those who have been disfranchised cannot vote. The Alexandria constitution disfranchised nearly the whole voting white population of Virginia; and some persons have undertaken to construe the oath so as to exclude all those persons. I do not believe Congress intended to exclude them—I am sure of it. The authorities there have registered these men. I think it would be well, either by an act or by a general understanding, to have it understood that these persons are not excluded. It would have been a farce to exclude the great mass of the voting white population of that State. What we want to do is, to bring these States into these Chambers in the best possible manner, with the rights and privileges of everybody secure. I have no anxiety about the result. I believe these States will all conform to the requirements; and I believe at least seven of these States are sure to send men here who will vote right and speak right on all questions concerning the union of the country, the maintenance of the authority of the Government, and of the equal rights of all men of all races and conditions. These rebel States are to be radical progressive States, devoted to unity, liberty, justice, education, development. I venture to put upon the records of the Senate the prediction that two thirds of the Senators and Representatives of those States will be as radical Republicans as are the Republican Senators and Representatives of New England. I welcome these to be regenerated States to their practical relations and to representation.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not wish to protract the debate on this subject. I have simply to state the question just exactly in its naked proportions, and I think it will be found that the amendment is one which should commend itself to the judgment of the Senate. I have said, and my statement has been corroborated from a quarter that I did not know it could be corroborated from, by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the officers of registration in the State of Virginia, or some parts of the State of Virginia, have, through some refinement of construction, settled down upon the conclusion that no man who was in office at the time of the rebellion is disfranchised by the oath that is required to be taken; but they confine the disfranchisement to those who had been in office before, and then, after having been in office, engaged in the rebellion. Now, sir, it is perfectly agreed on all hands, as I understand it, that those men who were in office at the time of the rebellion and afterward engaged in the rebellion should be disfranchised; and yet, simply because there is a possibility that, in the refinement of their constructions down there, they may extend the operation of this to men that took office under the rebellion, this amendment is to be voted down, the necessity and value of which every Senator here who concurred in the original measures of reconstruction is willing to admit. Now, sir, there is just the simple point. The evil that has been represented, and which this amendment is intended to remedy, is to be allowed to go on, simply because some other construction may, by possibility, be put upon the language, which will keep more men off the registration, and deprive them of the right to vote, who, some of the Senators think, ought not to be deprived of that right.

Mr. HOWARD. I am disposed to favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, because I think it carries out in very plain terms what was the original intention of the oath which we prescribed in the supplemental act. It was certainly my understanding of that oath that it did disfranchise a man who, although holding office, entered into the rebellion during his tenure of office; but I understand a more strict and artificial construction has been given to this oath by some persons, and that a person who continued holding an office, and while in office actually entered into the rebellion, is not held to come within the category of the proscribed or of the disqualified. The amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri certainly removes any doubt which possibly could be raised upon the statute, and I am therefore in favor of it. It certainly was my understanding that a person thus situated was to be held disqualified, because the reason is just as strong in his case as in the case of a man who had ceased to be an officer and after that cessation went into the rebellion.

Mr. DRAKE. Stronger.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, stronger if anything, because the duty of allegiance was still stronger upon an actual officer in the discharge of his functions than upon a man who had ceased to be an officer; and after all, this part of the oath is founded upon this idea, that it was especially incumbent upon officers of a State who had been in the exercise of their functions, or were continuing in that exercise, to be faithful to the Government of the United States and to commit no act of hostility to it. It was especially flagrant on the part of such officers to break their oath and break their faith to the Government, they occupying the attitude of conservators of the peace, and their examples being especially those to which the lower classes looked up and by which they were influenced. This oath was originally brought forward for the purpose of punishing bad faith in high circles; and as this amendment of the Senator from Missouri carries out that idea clearly, so as to admit of no legerdemain construction, no refinement, and no possibility of evasion, I am in favor of incorporating it now in the oath.

Mr. JOHNSON. I concur with my friend from Michigan and the honorable member from Missouri that the construction which the oath is said to have received in Virginia is erroneous. I have no doubt the purpose was to exclude from the privilege of the franchise all persons who were in office at the time of the rebellion. The amendment therefore, if it went no further than to correct that misconception, would receive my support. I object to it only upon the ground that it will give rise to other doubts at least, or will necessarily involve a construction which will exclude many persons who are not excluded by the acts which this is to explain. I suppose that the object can be accomplished just as well without risking at all the danger of increasing the number to be excluded; and I will suggest, therefore, to my friend from Missouri, that instead of amending the section as he proposes to do, he amend it by saying "whether the party was holding office at the time of the rebellion or before." Then there could be no doubt that the mischief of the erroneous construction would be corrected, and that there could be no construction put upon the words that would lead to another mischief of another kind. I propose, therefore, if I am in order, if the honorable member will not adopt the suggestion, to amend by adding to the clause the words which I send to the desk, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was in section six after the word "not" in line seven to insert "and whether he was holding such office at the time of the rebellion or had held it before;" so that the section will read:

That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary acts (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and whether he was holding such office at the time of the rebellion, or had held it before, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it makes a very awkward section of it, and does not alter its legal effect at all, as now proposed by the Senator from Maryland. I do not, therefore, have any serious objection to it, and yet I think it is wholly unnecessary. We, all of us, certainly did intend to disfranchise those persons who held office in a State and afterwards went into the rebellion; and how it is possible that they did not hold office if they were in office at the time the State went into rebellion I cannot conceive. It seems to me when you undertake to incorporate words of this kind you will get into greater difficulties instead of less.

Now, I beg leave to remind my worthy friend from Michigan [Mr. Howard] that very probably this session of Congress has grown out of an amendment which he insisted upon to the supplemental reconstruction act, and which now all hands agree we should disregard; and that is, in putting that long oath into the supplemental reconstruction act, an oath repeating over twice several of the clauses; and that being put in, the Attorney General comes along and says that is the only qualification that can be required of anybody. Now what do we do? We agree that that is not so, but that it is to be left to the board of registration to determine who is qualified to vote, exactly the way the law read before the Senator from Michigan interpolated this oath into it. The bill provided for boards of registration as it was pending in the Senate, but the Senator from Michigan was not satisfied with that, and he succeeded in inducing the Senate to put into it an oath which the Attorney General has construed as being the only requisite for voting upon anybody, even upon females. If they can take it, they can vote. I do not suppose the Senator from Michigan meant that exactly; and now I believe he agrees with the rest of us that that oath shall not be the only requisite, but that it shall be left to the board of registration to determine under the law on such evidence as they can get whether the person applying to be registered is entitled to be registered and to vote or not.

I shall not take up time about this amendment. If the Senate think proper to adopt it I do not know that any harm will grow out of it; but I am quite sure no good will come of it.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not feel very well contented that the honorable Senator from Illinois should hold me, a poor, humble individual of this body, responsible for the false logic of the Attorney General, nor his bad reasoning, nor his unfounded conclusions. I think that is pretty hard. I regard it as unconstitutional, [laughter;] as inflicting a cruel and unusual punishment, not upon the guilty, but the innocent really. [Laughter.]

The honorable Senator from Illinois is also somewhat mistaken when he says that I drew the whole of this oath. He will discover if he looks into the record that a considerable portion of this long oath, as he calls it, originated in the House of Representatives, and was added there as an amendment after the bill had once passed this body. However, I am not disposed at all to shirk any of the responsibility that belongs to me for my connection with the framing of the oath. If the oath had been fairly, and I will say further, properly and legally construed; we should have had no difficulty. It is not owing to the real intent and proper construction of the oath that we are called together here, but because the thing has been misused. It has been employed for purposes never contemplated by Congress in passing the oath.

One word further as to what the honorable Senator says of the power of the board of registration as originally framed in the bill. He remarks that it contained some discretion to the board of registration to reject an applicant although he was willing to take the oath, thus constituting the board a sort of judicial body to pass upon the application of the applicant. I do not remember that that was the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law declared what the qualifications should be, and appointed a board of registration, and of course that board would decide whether the applicant had those qualifications. That is all they would decide.

Mr. HOWARD. That was a mooted question during the discussion of the bill itself as to the extent of their judicial authority, and I think the honorable Senator will find that the act as we passed it contained precisely the same power to the board as the original bill to which he refers. I think there was no alteration made in that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there was; but the Attorney General, however, in consequence of this oath being afterward put in, insisted that that was all that was required. Now, I should like to inquire of my friend from Michigan, while I am up, whether he intended by leaving the word "male" out of the oath, which was in the law, to allow females to vote? [Laughter.] He has left that word out, while he has inserted in the oath all the other requirements embraced in the statutes, and it would seem to have been designedly left out by my friend from Michigan. I wish to know whether he designed that as an insidious way of conferring the right of suffrage upon all the females of the South, both black and white? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. I did not suppose it would be necessary, certainly it is not very usual, to require a person on oath to state whether he or she is a male or female. If the Senator from Illinois has been engineering a bill through this body which required a party to take such an oath, and to state on oath whether he or she was a male or a female, it is quite high time that it should be corrected. [Laughter.]

The oath to which he refers was intended to embrace, and it does embrace I believe specifically, all the qualifications required by the law for an applicant for registration or voting. It is not my fault, it is not the fault of Congress, if the Attorney General has given it a perverted construction, or perverted it in its operations. We are not responsible for that. It was his duty to carry out the law according to its true intent and meaning, and to give the oath a practical, common-sense construction. If he has failed in that, and if that failure has necessitated the present assembling of Congress, as seems to be true, it is not our fault, but the fault of somebody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. SUMNER. I thought they had been ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the yeas and nays; but there seemed to be a general understanding that the amendment as amended should be adopted; there did not appear to be anybody objecting to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely inquired if the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. Let the vote be taken again, and it can be adopted without the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There has been no vote taken yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this question, unless the call is withdrawn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who called for them?

Mr. SUMNER. It was my impression that they were ordered; but I did not call for them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Massachusetts inquired if they had been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were ordered on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri; and that amendment has been amended; but I do not suppose that that dispenses with the call. However, if the call is withdrawn that is enough.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not care about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are not insisted upon. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I will send to the Chair an amendment to section six, to come in at the end of the section, to which I believe there will be no serious objection. It is to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the mere act of voting for an ordinance of secession, so-called, shall not of itself be deemed under this act engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States; nor shall any person be deemed disqualified for registration under this act merely because of his having held or exercised the functions of a justice of the peace, notary public, trustee, officer, or agent of any institution of learning, commissioner of banks, railroads, canals, roads, and bridges or highways, trustee of churches, religious associations or schools, minister, priest, or other person vested with the authority to solemnize marriage, State commissioner or agent for taking acknowledgments of deeds, conveyances, depositions, or affidavits.

I have been told that in the district of Virginia it has been ruled by General Schofield, the officer in command of that district, that where it appears that a person has held an office and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and has afterward done nothing more in promotion of the rebellion than to vote for the ordinance of secession, he is disqualified for registration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to inquire whether he means by that, voting for the ordinance of secession at the polls, or as a member of a constitutional convention or State Legislature? Does the Senator from Michigan mean not to disqualify the man who went into a convention or Legislature and there voted in his representative capacity for secession? Does the Senator want such a man to vote?

Mr. HOWARD. It was a fact generally true that these ordinances of secession were submitted to the people for popular ratification.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no; in several cases they were not submitted to the people.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; in some they were, and in some they were not. I refer more particularly to the popular vote. Now, the oath requires, in order to disqualify the applicant, that he should have held an office and taken the oath to support the Constitution and afterward engaged in the rebellion, or rendered it aid and comfort, or rendered aid and comfort to the enemies of the country, that is, the rebels. I do not think, I must confess, that in contemplation of law the mere voting in favor of an ordinance of secession without doing any other act promotive of the treason, the insurrection, the war, was a giving of aid and comfort to the enemies of the country. I think upon trial of an issue before a court of justice, if it should appear that the accused had done no other act except to vote for an ordinance of secession, he could hardly be held guilty of treason for having rendered aid and comfort to the enemy.

We all know very well that there were multitudes of persons in the seceding States who were in some sort coerced and forced by the superior pressure of the leaders of the movement to vote for the ordinance of secession, but who are now repentant, who now regret the course that they have taken, and who never did any other act to promote the rebellion. It does seem to me, I must confess, that to disfranchise a person for that sole cause, although he may now be a good Union man, although he may be entirely sick of the experiment which he undertook, is rather too severe; and I apprehend that General Schofield, if he has made such a ruling, has gone somewhat beyond the intent of the law. It is to clear up this doubt and remove this difficulty that I offer the amendment. There are considerable complaints, in the State of Virginia particularly, growing out of this same cause, and we certainly ought not to shut our eyes to it.

The other portion of the amendment relates to the classes of officers, State officers, who were not to be excluded from registration on account of having held State offices. I know as well as any one the difficulty of drawing an exact line of demarcation, or making out a perfect catalogue of persons who are to be called executive or judicial officers of a State. These offices are so various, their functions are so diverse, some being local, some being general; some being important, others merely trivial; some being of a purely local character, others of a purely religious, moral, or educational character, that it is really very difficult to define what is a judicial or executive State office. In order to make it as clear as practicable, I have, in the latter part of my amendment inserted a clause excluding by name certain classes of officers and functionaries from the operation of the disqualification. I submit it to the Senate, and I shall, for one certainly, be very much disposed to vote in favor of it. I shall be very glad to hear the views of Senators upon the subjects embraced in the amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to ask whether the Senator includes members of the bar in his amendment. I understand from its reading that there is a long enumeration of particular officers. I suppose that the members of the legal profession would be judicial officers in a certain sense; and I think they ought to be saved from the operation of our stringent laws much more than gentlemen who participated in conventions and who voted their States out of the Union, and in fact instigated all the subsequent proceedings connected with the war. There is one difficulty in assenting to an amendment of this kind. Under a legal rule of construction, it may be held, and properly held, that all subordinate and insignificant officers in the whole southern country that are not enumerated in the exceptions made by the Senator fall under the condemnation of the law; whereas, perhaps, without such an amendment, the law would be construed not to include them. For this reason, it is a very dangerous thing to attempt the enumeration of particular individuals in an enactment of this description. You must have complete information of the whole subject, and have it entirely before you; you must have a complete knowledge of the details and know what all the officers were which may be affected by your legislation; and then you must see to it that your enumeration is complete, that it does not omit any particulars which ought to be included. I have made an inquiry of the Senator which perhaps he did distinctly hear, but which I should like to have answered before I vote upon this amendment. I have also stated the reason why I shall hesitate in voting for the amendment at all unless certain that it includes all the particulars which ought to be included in such an exception.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the amendment be reported again.

The Chief Clerk again read it.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask leave of the Senate to amend my amendment, by inserting after the words "so-called" the words "at a popular election."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. How will it read then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the mere act of voting for an ordinance of secession, so-called, at a popular election, shall not of itself be deemed under this act engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, &c.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Michigan whether he believes this amendment of his to be a part of the law of the last session; whether it is not enlarging or repealing a portion of the law to which this bill is an amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. In answer to the question propounded by the honorable Senator, I beg to say that I do not think it is changing the legal force of the oath which we have enacted; and if the Senator will allow me I will tell him why. The oath reads in this way:

"That I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof."

Now, I must confess that as a lawyer I cannot hold that a person who went to the polls and simply voted in favor of an ordinance of secession, and who has done no other act at all to promote the rebellion, who has not engaged actively in the rebellion, I do not believe that such a person can be said to be guilty of having rendered aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States in the language of the oath. This is constitutional language. The Constitution declares that treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them (the enemies) aid and comfort. It is a transcript copied from a very ancient English statute defining treason; and I believe the courts in England, as well as in this country, have always held that in order to charge a party with treason, consisting in levying war or in rendering aid and comfort to the enemy, something more is necessary than the mere expression of an opinion; that it is necessary, in order to fix the crime upon the accused, and hold him responsible for treason, that it should appear in proof that he has done some act, not merely expressed an opinion, tending naturally and reasonably to promote the cause of the rebellion, such as furnishing arms to the rebels, clothing to the rebels, food to the rebels, or doing any other act which in itself, as commonly understood, was intended by the offender to promote the treason. Now, it is very true that the passage of an ordinance of secession declaring the connection of the State with the United States to be dissolved forever is an act in its nature hostile to the Government of the United States and utterly incompatible with the duty of the State to the United States. But the giving of that simple vote I do not understand to be an act of treason.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, then, do you confine it to popular elections?

Mr. HOWARD. It is safer, I think, to confine it to popular elections than to allow it to be applied to secession conventions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a mere act of voting, in either case.

Mr. HOWARD. There is more responsibility, there is more guilt attached to the member of a convention in concocting the scheme, than to the common citizen who simply goes to the polls, and deposits his vote, and goes home.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think he might stay away.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask my friend, suppose two or more persons join in a conspiracy treasonable in its character, which afterward is followed by some act, would not the joining in that conspiracy be an act of treason?

Mr. HOWARD. The guilt of the conspiracy would be determined by the object which the party charged with the conspiracy had in view. If all he intended was to express an opinion that the State had better sever itself from the Government of the United States, and if he did not intend in his heart or show by his conduct that he gave this vote as a mere stepping-stone to the commission of acts of war, then I hold that he is not guilty of treason.

Mr. SUMNER. I will ask my friend just there, whether a vote is not something more than an expression of opinion; whether it is not an act; in other words, whether it is not an act by which the person who performs it mixes himself with the conspiracy, becomes a confederate?

Mr. HOWARD. Not necessarily. It was perhaps generally true among the secessionists; but such a vote does not necessarily connect itself with the guilt of the conspirators, whose object may have been, and was doubtless, to wage war upon the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. Why may it not be likened to an instance of enlistment against the country, even without being followed by an act of war?

Mr. HOWARD. The difference is this: that where an enlistment takes place, the party enlisting subjects himself to the military rule of the party or the government for whom he enlists, and he is not at liberty after the enlistment to withdraw his services. He is compelled by superior force to proceed in the performance of the military service for which he has enlisted. It is different in regard to a person who has simply voted at the polls for an ordinance of secession. He is not bound at all. There is upon him no legal obligation; there is no power upon him compelling him to engage actually in the rebellion, or to give it aid and comfort, but he may at any time withdraw from the country, or he may stay quietly at home, taking no part whatever, and I think be a man innocent of treason.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator did not comprehend the point I intended to make against his amendment. When the Senator introduced his amendment he remarked that the present law was construed to prohibit the registration of the class he has named in his amendment. I ask, then, how that amendment can obtain in this bill under the rule of the Senate, which the Senator voted for and was anxious to have passed, in which we prescribed and limited our action in this bill to removing obstructions and not repealing any measure contained in the old law? My point is, that his amendment is against the resolution of the Senate, that is our rule on this occasion.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the honorable Senator. Then, I will say in a few words—and perhaps this will better answer his question than any argument—I offer this portion of the amendment as explanatory and declaratory of the intention of the oath, and for the purpose of removing an obstruction which I understand exists in the State of Virginia and some other places to the registration of voters who are not by that oath excluded from registration.

Mr. SUMNER. I must say that I oppose with great hesitation and reluctance any proposition which comes from my excellent friend; I am led to distrust my own judgment, such is my habitual deference to him; but I must say—he will pardon me—that this proposition does sound strange coming from him; and then his distinction with regard to the legal character of the vote for secession seems to me very strange, coming from a lawyer so acute and so true always. I cannot doubt that every one who voted for an act of secession, in so voting committed an act of treason against the Government of the country. It was the beginning of the rebellion. It was the rebellion. Every man who gave such a vote was a rebel from that time forward. I cannot see it otherwise.

But the proposition of my friend goes further, and he gives us a long list of persons who are to be admitted to registration. He provides a perfect Noah's ark for the rebels. They may all come in in pairs. My friend before me [Mr. HOWE] says, male and female. [Laughter.] I do not know whether that is the idea of the Senator from Michigan or not. We distrust him now in that point, however. [Laughter.] Since the argument of my friend from Illinois we must look with a little jealousy to these propositions of the Senator from Michigan. They may carry us further than we are aware.

I am sure, however, sir, that this does carry us too far. It is very plain in its import. It seems to me it requires no elucidation. There it is. We can all read it or listen to it; and I am persuaded that we cannot embody it in our bill without opening a door to the rebels, by the side of which a church door would be nothing. It would be a door as broad as the horizon.

Mr. TIPTON. I have simply to say that I have always looked upon voting, or attempting to carry a State out of the Union by voting, as the crime of crimes. Armed resistance was something; but the terrible audacity of undertaking to carry out, by the ballot-box, a State, I think was the consummation of all crimes, and certainly, therefore, I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NYE. I had intended to be satisfied during this session with casting my vote on propositions submitted here by wiser and abler men than myself; and especially did I not think that in the course of legislation on this subject I should be called upon to differ with the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who has been to me during the long night of trouble that we have passed a fixed star by which I have guided my course. But, sir, it appears that this warm weather has put the Senator from Michigan in a very "melting mood," and he sees now no particular crime in those men who voted to tear down this temple of freedom. Why, sir, the persons that he here exempts from any effect of that crime were the witnesses attendant upon the birth of this monster treason. Ay, sir, they were more: the rebellion was born by that process. And yet now, in the kindness of his heart, the Senator from Michigan says he cannot see any particular offense in that.

I have noticed that the whole tendency of this session has been to open wide the gates and let in more of what the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] says are Union men now. From the commencement of this legislation I have apprehended that the danger lay in opening these gates too wide, and placing in the hands of these men the civil power that we wrested from them by the military power of the friends of this Government. The tendency of this legislation seems to derive its inspiration from the idea that men cannot live freely without voting, as though these States could never be reconstructed except it be upon the policy that all men must vote. Sir, I think prudence dictates that we should not open these gates too wide at first, that we should admit as few of the men whose hands are stained with rebellion to set in operation this experiment, even under our law of reconstruction, as is possible in view of the exigencies of the time. This is not final legislation. It is not said that these men shall never hereafter vote. If in the next Congress, when this experiment has been fairly made, we shall see that these men are penitent and desire to uphold the Government that they have so earnestly striven to overthrow, the gates can then be opened wider; and if a class is now excluded that ought not to be excluded the error had better lie in that direction than in opening the gates too wide.

Mr. President, we are hardly at liberty to close our eyes to the passing history of the hour; and I mean by that any history that is passing before us every day, any panoramic operation from the lights and shades of which we gather and drink in the true spirit that controls that portion of our country. Neither should this body be unmindful that the person who is to execute these laws that we pass will execute them (in all charity to say the least) most reluctantly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Executed by our officers.

Mr. NYE. "Executed by our officers," says the Senator from Illinois; but there is a greater than our officers who has executed them heretofore. I say the executive head of this Government is unfriendly to this whole system of legislation; and as an evidence of that, we see him and the Attorney General of the United States, with an acumen which I cannot comprehend or an obtuseness which unfits him for his place, seeking through long columns to find reasons why the law should not be executed, instead of turning their attention for one moment to find reasons why it should; and we now stand in the eyes of the enlightened world, precisely in this attitude, that the Attorney General of the United States is one majority over all Congress.

No man who knows them can doubt the combined or individual wisdom of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body. That committee embodies the experience of years and the energy of youthful manhood; all its members are ripe in their profession, all earnest and zealous in their efforts to heal up these wounds. In their wake I thought I was in perfect safety, and so I voted for what they reported at the last session, following the experienced Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the astute leader from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and the equal of either from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] and all of the committee who have made their pathway luminous with learning. And yet, sir, months after that action we are called here under the rays of a tropical sun because the Attorney General has with one fell swoop set at defiance the whole legislation upon this subject; and in return for his superior wisdom my distinguished friend from Michigan proposes to grant new terms, to be more generous. Sir, the world understands that the Attorney General who wrote this last constructive lesson that the world has received, if he was not the author, was present at the birth and helped to dress up in all its deformity the veto message of our bill. It then had more horns and tusks and dangers than he could enumerate; the nerves of this nation were appealed to and shaken with fear in apprehension of the wonderful usurpations of congressional power. Then we beheld nothing but tyrants; and the newspapers of the day of the party opposed to the majority in this body have called the five generals commanding in the southern districts the five tyrants of the age.

That was the music of that hour; it was the music of alarm; it was the cry of danger. The world was not frightened from its propriety by that declaration of the President of the United States. The process of reconstruction was going gloriously along, if we are to believe the history of the hour and the personal experience of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON;] the registers reported day after day that the number of colored voters outnumbered the white. Alarm began to be felt in another region, another section; the knees quaked with fear. Now, what next? This concentration of all wisdom, the Attorney General of the United States, must swallow the horns and dragon's teeth of the veto message and declare that these tyrants, who had been published as such the world over, were the merest nothings, policemen without any power except to prevent disturbance and put down any that might occur; that there their authority stopped, and that they were subordinate to a power that was born of the same material as that which the distinguished Senator from Michigan to-day proposes to let register and vote. That is the plain English of it. I think my friend must have forgotten the past when he drew this wonderful amendment. That set of men are holding power now, and the Attorney General has said that they hold it rightfully. I had supposed that by our legislation they were shorn of this power; this nation supposed they were shorn of their power. Ay, sir, the wisdom of the Judiciary Committee of this body and the wisdom of the other House supposed they were shorn of their power; but it seems that we have not succeeded.

What was the act of those persons who voted for the ordinance of secession and who are the very men that control these governments to-day? I do not propose at this late hour of the day to detain this body by discussing the technical question of treason under the Constitution with so astute a lawyer as my friend from Michigan. But, sir, I object to his whole course of reasoning. He has adopted the same course in that respect as the Attorney General has in his opinion overthrowing our legislation, trying to find through some technical loophole a place for a rebel to get in. I stand here, as I have ever stood, to guard against such dangers, and against them I protest. When he tells me that it does not constitute treason for the citizens of a State to vote to overthrow the government under which they are living and to establish a new one, carrying with it of course the power to sustain by arms that government which they create, it is a logic that I do not comprehend. There were sown the seeds from which this harvest of dragon's teeth has been reaped; they planted that from which treason grew, and to the sorrow of this country they reaped a most plentiful crop. Intending to dig the grave of the liberties of this country, they were acting seditiously at that solemn ceremony. My friend sees in that no reason why they should not be allowed to register and to vote. Sir, the man who pulled the trigger of the musket is an infant in crime compared to those who controlled him and made him do it. There never would have been a musket fired if these inborn rebels had not voted to make men fire them.

Now, sir, I insist upon it that we have trifled with this question long enough. Instead of opening the doors wide and bringing more enemies to conquer by legislation, I would make them less. You will bear me witness, Mr. President, that more than eighteen months ago, in my place I declared, and I reiterate it now, that there never will be substantial peace in this country till every rebel is dead or disfranchised. You cannot expect the fruits of liberty from a tree whose roots are buried in treason. I am sick of trifling and trucking to these men.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] says his experience is that they want to come in; and yet the published history of the day contradicts him. Are they anxious to come back? Then why drag this thing called an opinion from the Attorney General to show reasons why they should not? Are they anxious to come back? I say their public acts deny it everywhere. From what source does what we hear come from? It comes from those men who kept their fingers upon every pulsation of the confederacy from the day it was born in Montgomery till it terminated in bloody war. If the Senator from Michigan has any process in his mind by which he can bleach out that treason and make their garments white with liberty I should like to see it. It is not to be expected, in view of the past history of the world. If by the fortune of war the rebel government had overthrown the North and taken possession of this Government, I should be lying in wait constantly, night and day, for an opportunity to regain the lost liberties of my country. Would not my friend from Michigan?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. As it is with me so it is with them. They only await an opportunity in some way or other to revive the rebellion in which they were defeated. I have submitted all the time to follow in the wake of the Judiciary Committee, trusting and knowing that their judgments were safe. I have followed them faithfully; and yet there is a point when, if they are going to ride and I do not like to ride, I propose to go afoot. If the Representatives of the other States on the Pacific slope were here I should be silent; but from what I know of the spirit of the constituency that I represent and that these absent ones represent, I am aware that the only fear they have is of opening the gates too wide.

Sir, one suggestion more, and I have done. The Senate will not forget, the nation will never forget, the terrible anxiety with which we awaited the result of the voting in the outgoing States upon the question of secession. We felt then that everything depended on the votes which these rebels would cast. Sir, you remember when Virginia went from her orbit, and shot away like some wild star, how the heart of the loyal citizen was tortured. I remember, as State after State went out, the anxieties of this people increased. Why? For the reason that the rebels were voting. The nerves of this nation never shook before the combined thunders of rebel cannon as they shook before the result of that voting. The vote, the ballot is more potent than the bullet by far; and the Army faced the rebel bullets with twice the courage that the nation faced these rebel ballots. I regard them as laying the corner-stone of this rebellion. I regard them as high in crime, compared with the soldiers who fired the muskets. Let it not be said after all this experience that we are now to open the gates wider and let in a new recruit from this dangerous element of our betrayers. I deny in toto the logic that you can gain these people by magnanimous acts. We tendered them the constitutional amendment and they would not take it. We have wooed them with all the tenderness of a fond mother, and yet they would not; and nothing would have the least effect upon them but the bayonet and the military power. Before it they trembled. Before the bayonets of this Government were sheathed, in the opinion of the Attorney General, they were silent before the power and majesty of the law of Congress; but when the point was sheathed, when it was no longer able to pierce through this judicial barricade thus thrown up, their arrogance and their insolence was never equalled in the haughtiest days of the rebellion.

Sir, instead of letting down the stringency of the law, I think we should make it more stringent; and I should propose to do it if it was not that I feel bound to refrain; but it ought to be done. The judiciary committee will find that, before this work of reconstruction is complete, you have yet to make more stringent enactments. I would that the proposition of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] had been adopted, and that we had wiped out with one swoop every officer in these States. I would have put these States under the rule of military control, directed and governed by the supreme power of this nation. They deserve it; and I can stand here or in the day of judgment and defend myself with a myriad of speechless but potent witnesses. I could point the Senator from Michigan to wounds upon that Constitution which he is so careful to construe now in behalf of liberality to rebels. I can point to him scars that will never be healed, wounds that can never be closed. And yet at this time and under these circumstances we are asked to open wide the gates of danger and let an invading enemy within our very political temple.

Mr. President, in my feeble way I have attempted to show why I think that, above all other men, those who voted treason ought to be disfranchised. A justice of the peace can be disposed of by a single popular election; but those who voted for secession were the congregated and aggregated mass on which the leading traitors relied. I know that what I have said will probably have no effect before the superior power of the Senator from Michigan; but I would save the committee from doing what the Senator from Illinois charged me with to-day. I would make no mistake in this reconstruction bill; but whatever we may do I fear it will be considered faulty elsewhere. We have had only two editions of the Attorney General's opinions; but my friend from Illinois will not be seated in his prairie home before there will be another edition. This bill, as I understand it, simply reenacts the existing law, with some explanation; but a man who seeks to overthrow it, and looks for reasons why a law should not be executed, can find them anywhere. I congratulate the country that we have not an Attorney General actuated by the same motives and having the same legal powers as the Senator from Michigan. If he were made Attorney General, with his additional powers, acquisitions, and astuteness, I know not what would be the result. Whatever you do now, you will find an opinion to overthrow you. I propose to give them as stringent a thing to overthrow as I can; and above all, I conjure the Senate and this nation never to commit the mistake of trusting the liberties of this country in the hands of men who voted to overthrow it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that our proceedings are likely to be interrupted in the course of a few moments by a message from the House. I wish to say to the Senate, after having had conversations with many of the body, that it seems to be the general desire to get to an early vote upon this measure; and I trust we may have an understanding that we will to-morrow arrive at a vote upon it. I should be glad to have it understood that we shall vote at some particular hour; but if that cannot be done I trust Senators will come here to-morrow with the understanding that we shall remain until we dispose of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] entirely misunderstands me if he supposes that it is the intention or effect of the amendment which I have offered to enlarge the elective privileges granted by the existing statutes. I by no means intend to open the door wider; and he has known me too long and known my principles too well, I apprehend, to entertain any such apprehension in regard to myself. All that I am anxious for is to carry out the proposition which we have made in our laws for the reconstruction of the rebel States in its true intent and spirit. I do not propose to alter it in any essential particular. I see no necessity of so doing. I think the terms of the offer are very liberal indeed—are more liberal than the people of the rebel States are entitled to expect at our hands. But, sir, we know very well that questions of a very serious character have arisen under these laws—that the Attorney General has given them a construction in many respects tending to defeat the intent of the Congress that enacted them; and all the object of my amendment now offered is to ascertain the sense of the Senate as to what is the meaning and legal effect of the words which I shall read from the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, and which are also incorporated in the oath prescribed in the supplemental act. In the constitutional amendment we proposed the following provision:

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof."

Now, the question raised here is simply this: whether the mere fact of having voted at a popular election in favor of an ordinance of secession is, in contemplation of the act itself and of this amendment of the Constitution, an act rendering aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States? In other words, is such a vote treason against the United States; and did we intend when we passed that constitutional amendment and the supplemental reconstruction act, which recites and embodies it, to exclude from registration and voting every person who voted at a popular election in favor of an ordinance of secession? That is the question. The language in which it is couched has been differently construed by different boards of registration, as I am told, some boards holding that such a vote in favor of secession precluded the applicant from registration, and consequently from voting, while some other boards hold that that vote does not operate to exclude the applicant from registration. Here is a conflict of opinion among the boards who are to decide upon the rights of the applicant to registration. A doubt, and in many cases a painful doubt, exists as to the true legal effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will suspend his remarks to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

DEATH OF HON. C. DENISON.

Mr. McPHERSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and announced that he was instructed to notify the Senate of the death of Hon. CHARLES DENISON, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and to communicate the proceedings of the House thereon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the reading of the resolutions received from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the reception of the resolutions before us from the House of Representatives imposes upon me the duty of submitting some remarks concerning the late Representative from the twelfth congressional district of my State. And I must commence with the expression of my regret that I am not prepared to speak fully and clearly upon all the points which are appropriate to the occasion.

I knew Mr. DENISON for twenty-four years; during which time he was a member of the bar, and resident at Wilkesbarre, in Luzerne county. In recent years, in consequence of feeble health and the pressure of public duties, he withdrew himself from the practice of his profession and bestowed his attention somewhat to agricultural pursuits. The family of which he came is one of distinction in the history of the Wyoming valley, a fact which was favorable to his success at the bar and in public life.

Mr. DENISON was born January 23, 1818, and was a student at Dickinson College, where he graduated in 1839. He was elected a Representative in Congress in 1862 for the district composed of Luzerne and Susquehanna counties. He was reelected in 1864, and again in 1866, on each of the latter occasions by increased majorities, for he was able to concentrate upon himself a large measure of popular favor, and possessed some marked qualities of mind and character for commanding it. His will was firm; his industry constant; his temper steady, though sometimes pronounced, and his courage was unquestionable. He was of the men who pursue an object in private life with perseverance and zeal, and who, when placed in public stations, do not bend before the pressure of the times. But tenacity of purpose, resolute courage, and fidelity to conviction, important as they are to success in such a career as his, are not alone sufficient to secure it. He possessed in addition a sound judgment, a sense and love of humor, and fidelity to associates and friends. Hence he was able more perfectly to combine the elements of success as a professional and public man; to win and hold and use the confidence and attachment of client and voter.

Mr. DENISON did not claim to be eminent as a profound lawyer, an eloquent speaker, or an accomplished man of the world. He was plain, though easy in his manners, genial and social in private intercourse, and sensible everywhere. He made no false pretensions, and if he could now dictate his picture to us, would desire to be painted as he was, and in no false or flaring colors of art.

Mr. DENISON's political convictions were extremely ardent and uncompromising. What he said in the House of Representatives and his votes there mark this trait of his character distinctly. It was never doubted that his political opinions were sincere, and he always gave them unflinching support.

After the adjournment of Congress at the short session last spring, Mr. DENISON remained a short time in Washington, and I saw him almost daily. His health was then much broken, and he was not hopeful of its restoration; but his mind was not clouded by gloom nor was its energy impaired. It is a cause of gratification to me that I was able to serve him at that time in several matters of business and of friendship in which his feelings were deeply interested, and thus contribute to his composure and satisfaction of mind. When he left I indulged the expectation that the repose and comforts of home would invigorate his frame and enable him to meet with us once more in council; but it has been otherwise ordered. His home has been clothed in mourning and his seat among the Representatives of the people is vacant. He died at Wilkesbarre of pulmonary disease a few days before the commencement of our present session, and it only remains for us to acquiesce in the event, to accept the instruction which it affords, and to adopt appropriate resolutions of respect for the memory of the deceased.

I offer for consideration and adoption by the Senate the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES DENISON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning by wearing grape on the left arm for the residue of the session.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I rise to second the motion of my colleague, and I regret that I knew only a short time ago, since the Senate met to-day, that these resolutions were to be presented, for the reason that I am not as well prepared to do justice to the character of the deceased as I should be if I had had notice.

I knew Mr. DENISON very slightly. I knew his family well. He was born in the far-famed valley of Wyoming, perhaps the most beautiful part of Pennsylvania, if it is not the most beautiful portion of the United States. That valley was settled by some of the most intelligent people who came into Pennsylvania, certainly by the most heroic and gallant and patriotic men that ever lived in any portion of this country. The early settlers were from New England. They came there at an early day; they came when the boundaries of the State were not sufficiently known, and remained there a long time before their titles were properly settled. During the Revolution the settlers were active in support of the cause of the country. After the Revolution they were harassed by such troubles as the people of no other part of Pennsylvania were subjected to. They had great troubles about their titles, and they had to contend with a long series of Indian invasions and massacres of the most cruel kind. On one occasion nearly all the people had taken refuge in a block house, but were by some means surrounded and destroyed. Among those massacred there was the grandfather of Mr. DENISON. In after years George Denison, the uncle of this gentleman, served several years in Congress, and after having been in Congress he served in our State Legislature. He was a man known to everybody in Pennsylvania for his very high order of talents and for his very great integrity. No public man has ever lived in Pennsylvania who has made such a record for these two great qualities as George Denison, and no man, public or private, in his day did more by his services in the Legislature to develop the region which gave him birth.

The people of that valley, from their earliest history, paid more attention to the cultivation of their intellects and their manners than any other portion of our people. The first schools of any importance established in the State were in the valley of Wyoming; and in consequence of this the immediate descendants of the earlier settlers were people of culture, far advanced above other portions of our people. It is, besides, a section of country most highly favored by nature. The valley itself, in its agricultural luxuriance, is equal to any part of the far-famed valley of the Mississippi. Every rood of it is cultivatable soil, and below the surface the earth abounds in as fine mineral coal as can be found in any other part of the world. There is no equal amount of territory so rich in soil and minerals as the valley of Wyoming. It was there that Mr. DENISON was born, and there lived and died his ancestors. It was there that he received his early instruction. It is there that his associations were made. He could therefore hardly fail to have been a man of marked ability and marked culture.

He and I did not agree in political sentiment, but his uncle and myself did. I have always believed him to be not only a man of talent and culture, but a man of entire honesty and of the most pure life and high-toned sentiments. I knew, also, very well the family from which his wife sprang. They, also, were people who took part in the Revolution and all the struggles of this country; but they resided in a different part of the State. I offer to his wife and children my most sincere sympathy for the loss of their husband and father. I can only add that I cordially unite in the resolutions of my colleague.

The resolutions were adopted nem. con.; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed an act

(S. No. 167) to establish certain post roads; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

TREATMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas there has been no thorough and systematic investigation of the treatment by the Confederate authorities and people of Union officers, soldiers, and citizens captured or held by them during the rebellion; and whereas it is important to the nation that such investigation should be had and a record thereof be made: Therefore,

Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House be appointed to make such investigation, and to record the facts thereby obtained, and report the same to the House at any time with such recommendations as may seem proper.

Be it further resolved, That such committee, for the purpose of this investigation, shall have power to send for persons and papers, to appoint a clerk and stenographer, and to sit during any recess of the House; and that the expenses of the investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Be it further resolved, That it is believed throughout the country that the Confederate authorities were cognizant of, and participants in, great outrages upon the laws of war, of civilization, and of our common humanity, which were perpetrated upon Union officers, soldiers, sailors, marines, and citizens while in their power; and that said authorities acted through inferior officials and citizens. And as such persons may be deterred from giving evidence through fear of punishment for their said offenses, therefore the committee are hereby empowered to report an act of grace and amnesty, according to parliamentary usage, to any person or persons having cognizance of the unlawful treatment of persons as aforesaid, who has not already been put on trial and convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction for complicity therein, who shall give material and truthful evidence tending to bring to light the facts connected with such unlawful treatment. And that in the judgment of the House no person in whose favor such report is made ought to be brought to trial, or any evidence given by him to the committee used against such person on any trial.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I inquire whether it would not be better to refer this investigation to the committee already raised by the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. SHANKS. That committee has as much now as it can do.

Mr. WOOD. We have no power to delegate to a committee of this House to grant a general amnesty; and I rise to a question of order, that this resolution proposes an appropriation, and must under the rules have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman is aware there is a contingent fund provided by general appropriation bill passed by both Houses, and an appropriation of this kind is not considered to come under the rule.

Mr. WOOD. It is a traveling committee to go over the whole country.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHANKS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The previous question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 37, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Banks, Blair, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, McClurg, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Beaman, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Driggs, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Jencks, Kerr, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Munsen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Price, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Buckland, Calk, Chanler, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dixon, Dodge, Eila, Eldridge, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Halsey, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Moorhead, Morrell, Noell, Paine, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Schenck, Selye, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—52.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. SHANKS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand while I call his attention, as I did that of my colleague day before yesterday, to the phraseology of one of these resolutions. I had my doubts about the wisdom of passing such a resolution at the time, but I was led to believe from statements made here that it did not bear the construction which I apprehended it might bear; but on seeing it in print—and I see that the gentleman from Indiana has copied the former resolution—it is very apparent that it is open to the construction to which I called the attention of my colleague when it was up before. It attempts to pledge the faith of the Government not only that no person shall have used against him the evidence which he gives before the committee, but that he shall not be tried at all upon any evidence from any source.

Now, very likely it may be proper to so pledge the faith of the Government, but it does it in this resolution in advance to any person who shall give testimony. It declares that he shall not be tried if the committee make a report in his favor. It does not say "if the House shall coincide with the committee," but the language is "that in the judgment of the House no person in whose favor such report shall be made ought to be brought to trial, or any evidence given by him to the committee used against such person on any trial." Such is the resolution we passed the other day; it pledges in advance the faith of this country to anybody who, in the opinion of that committee, whether the House agree or not, ought to have amnesty granted to him; that he shall not be tried at all.

I regret very much that that phraseology was contained in the resolution passed the other day, and unless it is stricken out of the present resolution I shall be obliged to vote against it. While I said the other day that I would trust my colleague or any committee appointed by this House as soon as I would trust any other five men, I nevertheless did not deem it wise to pledge in advance the faith of this Government to any person, however much he might be involved in that conspiracy, or however valuable the evidence which the country might obtain upon such a pledge. I hope the gentleman will modify that resolution or strike it out altogether.

Mr. SHANKS. I was not well pleased with the phraseology referred to in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I only inserted it here because it was passed by the House the other day. My opinion was then and it is now that that part of the resolution is objectionable. I shall not, therefore, insist upon retaining it, but am perfectly willing to strike out that part relating to amnesty.

Mr. SPALDING. Will not the mover allow the subject to be referred to the special committee appointed to inquire into the assassination of the President? I am averse to making so many committees. The charges for all these committees will be against the contingent fund, and I do not think that fund will bear it. If the gentleman will allow me I will make the motion to refer it to that committee.

Mr. SHANKS. I have already declined to allow that motion to be made.

The last resolution was accordingly modified by striking out the latter part, as follows:

And that in the judgment of the House no person in whose favor such report shall be made ought to be brought to trial, or any evidence given by him to the committee used as evidence against such person on any trial.

Mr. SHANKS. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 56, noes 54; and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a separate vote on the resolutions.

Mr. DRIGGS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the first resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the first resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 29, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Polsey, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Calk, Chanler, Dixon, Dodge, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Morrill, Peters, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Stewart, Thomas, Upson, Van Wyck, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—39.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the first resolution, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next question was on the second resolution; which was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the third resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. Was not that resolution withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Indiana modified it, but did not withdraw it.

Mr. SHANKS. Let me explain.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the previous question, and debate is not in order.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to explain the third resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. BURR. I demand the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 75, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Ferriss, Fields, Harding, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Miller, Moorhead, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Polsey, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dixon, Driggs, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercer, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Peters, Phelps, Price, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Calk, Chanler, Dodge, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fox, Gravelly, Halsey, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Morgan, Morrill, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Scofield, Stewart, Taylor, Thomas, Van Wyck, Ward, and Stephen F. Wilson—36.

So the third resolution was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon the preamble.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to amend the preamble so as to read as follows:

Whereas it is expedient that the subject of the treatment of prisoners of war and Union citizens held by the Confederate authorities during the recent rebellion should be thoroughly investigated.

I demand the previous question on the preamble.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

The preamble, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the several votes by which the preamble and resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads; when the Speaker signed the same.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a word or two in the nature of personal explanation, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House for that purpose.

No objection was made.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is in regard to an article in the New York Herald of the 8th instant. I desire to say that if these remarks related only to myself, no matter what they were, I should treat them, as I do all such things, without notice. And, indeed, in regard to any principles which I am supposed to have enunciated I have nothing to say. It is because the article contains unpleasant personal strictures on others that I desire to say a word, and I shall confine myself to that alone.

This publication purports to be the disclosure of a private conversation with me some two or three weeks ago. I have no disposition to criticise the practice of disclosing private conversations if any person will undertake it in the newspapers. This purports to be an account of a private conversation in my sitting-room. I have no fault to find with the gentleman. He seemed to be very much of a gentleman. He seemed to be an intelligent gentleman. I believe he is both. He called at my house and asked to have some conversation with me. I assented. I allowed him as much time as he chose to talk; and he talked to me like a very intelligent, gentlemanly man, as I have no doubt he was. The only fault I have to find with him is that, without submitting the manuscript to me, he has disclosed what he says was my conversation with regard to my associates on this floor. All the rest of the article, including the criticisms upon myself, I care nothing about, and do not object to their accuracy, though I am charged with entertaining certain foolish political aspirations.

But to come to the point. In the first place, so far as my remarks are supposed to have had reference to any members of this House, I do, as I have a right to do, disclaim them all. Not knowing precisely how far anything actually said would justify the inferences drawn by the writer, I disclaim the whole and repudiate the sentiments attributed to me. I do not desire that anything of that kind should stand on record against any of my associates in this House. Therefore, even if I had said such things yesterday in debate, I should rise to-day and apologize and disclaim them all. But, sir, I do not admit the truth of these statements, because that would be opening the question of a private disclosure. I speak only of the personalities.

I will refer to a single instance to show how absurd some of these statements are. The reference to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and his colleagues seems to me to be its own answer. It is stated that I accused him of "want of backbone and blood." Now, sir, if there be anything for which that distinguished gentleman has been noted ever since I first knew him, some twenty years ago I think, it is a determined will and "backbone," which would bear him through anything he might undertake. If he has not quite as much "blood" as he had before he went into the field, it is of quite as pure a quality, not deteriorated by his action in favor of the nation. So with reference to what I am stated to have said, although I believe it is more in the shape of inference than otherwise, with regard to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I am represented as saying that he had acquired his reputation by false pretenses. Now, sir, if there is anything in the world of which that gentleman would everywhere be acquitted, and of which it would be absurd to accuse him, it is acquiring reputation or anything else by false pretenses.

I shall, therefore, sir, distinctly and in a lump repudiate the whole of these personal remarks, holding myself responsible for them in no way. While I cannot help condemning this writer for undertaking to disclose what he admits to have been a private conversation so far as persons are concerned, yet I am not disposed to find fault with him except with regard to the disparaging remarks which I am represented as having made with reference to my associates on this floor, all which remarks I disclaim. I consider the balance of the article as no breach of confidence.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] permit me to ask him whether in that conversation he asserted his belief that the New York Herald was the only true Union newspaper during the war? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This cross-questioning is very dangerous, for it might bring me into difficulty with my friend Mr. Greeley. [Laughter.]

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to suspend the rules to allow me to record my vote upon the passage of the bill passed yesterday, amending the reconstruction acts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COVODE. I move that the rules be suspended so as to allow all members who desire it to record their votes on that bill during to-day.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire whether, in order that the record may be regular, it is not proper that these votes should be recorded by general consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rules, has no power to ask general consent for such a purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. By the process now proposed, may we not reverse our action upon a bill some days after it has passed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not put the question in such a case, without notifying the House what might be the result.

Mr. BROOKS. If general consent were asked, I presume there would be no objection. That, according to my recollection, has been the usual practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask general consent for such a purpose. A suspension of the rules is the only method of reaching the object.

Mr. GETZ. I would inquire whether the recording of these votes would change the result? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not. If the vote were close the Chair would advise the House of that fact.

The motion of Mr. COVODE was agreed to. Messrs. BROOMALL, CORNELL, and COVODE recorded their votes in the affirmative; and Messrs. HAIGHT and KERR in the negative.

HOMESTEAD SETTLEMENT IN ALABAMA, ETC.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill further to extend and apply the provisions of the act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BRITISH OUTRAGES UPON AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be requested to report immediately whether any American citizen has been arrested, tried, or convicted and sentenced in Great Britain or Ireland for words spoken or acts done in the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the reading of a brief statement of facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The case of Stephen J. Meany.

"Mr. Meany was arrested in London on the 1st of December last on an Irish warrant granted on information and belief that the informant heard and believed that Mr. Meany had conspired with others in New York to compass the death of the Queen, subvert her Government, &c. He was carried off to Ireland without having been brought before an English magistrate, as provided by the habeas corpus act. Mr. Meany was committed to solitary confinement, on the silent system, while an agent of the British Government was sent to New York to hunt up testimony against him. This testimony was produced at his trial on a charge of 'treason-felony' in Dublin, and amounted to the fact that he had made a speech in favor of the Fenian organization in Clinton Hall, Eighth street, New York city, and had been known to offer Fenian bonds for sale in said city.

The attorney general for Ireland, who conducted the prosecution, admitted that the accused was not charged with any crime committed in the United Kingdom, nor could any such charge be sustained; but he claimed that words spoken and acts done in the United States, in connection with a conspiracy in her Majesty's dominions, were sufficient to bring the prisoner under the jurisdiction of the court. Baron Hughes, the presiding judge, differed with the attorney general. He did not think that the prisoner came within his jurisdiction for acts performed outside the United Kingdom; and while bound to accept the verdict of 'guilty' from the jury, he refused to pass sentence. Mr. Meany was accordingly remanded, and now awaits the decision of the twelve judges. If they decide against him, he—an American citizen, condemned for exercising freedom of speech in America—will probably have to endure the horrors of penal servitude for many years. It is not pretended that Mr. Meany had committed any overt acts in Great Britain or Ireland. He was tried and convicted for words spoken in the city of New York, and upon this charge alone, as the accompanying statement of the attorney general shows. Therefore it appears eminently proper that the good offices of the United States Government should be interposed in this case to protect its citizens from persecution and punishment by a foreign Government for the exercise of that freedom of speech which they enjoy under the constitution and laws of their own country."

Extract from Report of the Trial of Stephen Joseph Meany in Dublin.

"Stephen J. Meany was brought before Baron Hughes. The attorney general prosecuted. John Devany and Thomas Doyle proved the connection of Meany with the Brotherhood in New York, having heard him speak at Clinton Hall and seen him offer Fenian bonds for sale.

"After hearing all the evidence tendered by the Crown, the judge requested to know what act had been proved that brought the prisoner within the jurisdiction of the court. The attorney general contended that although no act was proved in this country, yet as he had proved the existence of a conspiracy to depose the Queen, acts tending to the same done outside the United Kingdom should convict.

"His lordship was of a different opinion, and refused to pass sentence. He, however, accepted a verdict of guilty, and put back the prisoner till he should further examine into the case."

From the New York Herald of March 11, 1867.

The Case of Stephen J. Meany.

"The case of this gentleman, who has recently been convicted of treason-felony in Ireland, presents some curious features, which may probably arrest the attention of our Government. Mr. Meany is an American citizen, and if he has been unjustly dealt with, as alleged, his case may become a subject of interference by the State Department. The crimes with which he was charged were committed in New York, namely, making a speech at Clinton Hall and offering Fenian bonds for sale. These are certainly not crimes in this country; and when the attorney general who conducted the prosecution admitted that no overt acts in the United Kingdom were proven or even alleged against Mr. Meany, we are not surprised to find Baron Hughes deciding that acts and words done and spoken in New York were not crimes in Great Britain and Ireland, and declining to sentence the prisoner. If the judge had ruled otherwise what would become of our boasted freedom of speech? Mr. Meany, however, is still in prison, awaiting the decision of the Court in Error, before which these points, as well as the fact that he was arrested in London and carried over to Dublin for trial, in violation of the habeas corpus act, will be argued. If the ruling of Baron Hughes is set aside the prisoner will be condemned to penal servitude—a punishment worse than death—for a long period of years. It was claimed in Mr. Meany's defense that he had no connection with or knowledge of any overt acts of treason in Ireland, nor were any proven. He was tried and convicted for words spoken in this city. If the Court in Error should reverse the judgment of the court below it becomes a question whether the prisoner must not be regarded as a citizen of the United States who has been seriously abused, and become a subject for the interference of our Government."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but one minute to state that since the trial of Mr. Meany, notwithstanding the action of the chief judge who tried him, the appeal for a new trial has been denied and he has been sentenced to a fifteen years' imprisonment. He is an American citizen, as that statement informs us, and I believe it to be true. He was arrested, sir, for words spoken and acts done in the city of New York under our own flag. He was not accused in his trial of having done anything in Great Britain against the laws of that kingdom, but for words spoken and acts done in the city of New York an American citizen is now enduring a fifteen years' penal servitude.

A MEMBER. Has he been naturalized here?

Mr. ROBINSON. The papers state that he is an American citizen, and I believe it to be so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust there is spirit enough in this country, I trust, sir, there is weight enough in the metal of our Army and Navy to take that man out of whatever strong prison he may be in if they do not give him up willingly. I trust that the American Government is powerful enough, that our Army and Navy metal is weighty enough to bring him back even if in its march to the prison where he is we have to tread down the nation which has imprisoned him.

Mr. Speaker, I have at a former time called attention to this matter, and requested through this House by resolution information from the State Department, which I regret to say we have not yet received. I hope, sir, that we will turn away from punishing our own people and take time to look after the dignity and safety of American citizens, who may be imprisoned abroad.

One word further. I say "report immediately." I mean with proper deliberation. I understand the committee will have a meeting to-morrow. I mean that the committee shall be directed to report at an early day, that at least during this session we shall have a report from that committee on this subject.

There is another gallant soldier (William J. Nagle) in reference to whom my friend and colleague [Mr. Wood] will introduce a resolution, who went into the terrible fight at Fredericksburg with a large number of brave men under him and came out with only a very few of his command surviving. That gallant Union soldier, who is also imprisoned in Great Britain, is a native-born American citizen.

I might add that I have a report of the trial of Meany on my desk, contained in a Dublin paper. The attorney general says he means to make this a case for any other American who has the hardihood to do anything of the same kind. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have but recently returned, myself, from Europe, and from personal observation within the last six weeks in Ireland, where I landed on the 25th of May, I am satisfied that every statement made by my colleague with reference to the insecurity of every American citizen, whether native or adopted, is a palpable self-evident fact in that country. It is impossible for any American to land at Queenstown from any steamer that arrives there whose baggage is not expressly searched, and if he has an ordinary pocket-pistol—I had almost said an ordinary penknife—it is pronounced contraband and is seized by the officers of the British Government.

The case to which I refer is that of Colonel William J. Nagle, a native of the city of New York, a distinguished officer of the Federal Army during the whole of the late war. He went to Ireland to visit some relatives of his father. Without having uttered, during his stay in that country, one single word of sedition, while on his way to Waterford he was arrested and plunged into jail, where he now remains. I ask the Clerk to read a letter published in the New York Tribune detailing more specifically the facts, and I hope my colleague will accept an amendment to include the name of Colonel Nagle in his resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I accept it.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

COUNTY CORK JAIL, June 14, 1867.

DEAR FATHER: I was arrested on the 1st of June, in company with Colonel J. Warren, on the bridge crossing the Blackwater, from Waterford into Youghal. We were kept in the Youghal Bridewell until the morning of the 4th, when we were sent to this prison—marched through the streets of both places handcuffed, like felons. We are now held under a warrant from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and will remain prisoners so long as the fears and purposes of the Government may require the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, unless some action is taken by the authorities or Government of our country. We are held under suspicion of being connected with the "Fenian conspiracy," so called in this country. No evidence of any kind is shown, or charge made, other than "suspicion," which is applied, as a general rule, to all Americans. I will place my case before the United States minister at London. The correspondence with Mr. Adams, and his communication, which may become necessary with the State Department, must consume much time. It would be well for you to take immediate steps to bring my case before the notice of the people, and have the subject brought before Congress at its coming session in July. This is not exclusively an individual case, but becomes a question of right involving the liberty of every American citizen that sets foot on this soil. I ask the Government of my country—which I have faithfully served, whose laws I have never violated—to secure to me that liberty which is my birthright, and of which I am now deprived, without any cause or plea of justification, by an authority I do not recognize, a Government to which I owe no allegiance, and whose laws I have in no way infringed upon. My arrest followed so quick upon my arrival in this country that I had no opportunity to find any of my relatives whom I intended to visit. My chances of being in Paris this summer are doubtful. I must be content to suffer the penalty of being an American soldier with Irish blood in my veins, so far offending the majesty of the British law as to be found upon Irish soil.

Your son,

WILLIAM J. NAGLE.

D. M. NAGLE, New York.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to this inquiry. I am very much at a loss to know whether we can legitimately inquire into trials taking place in another country. I understood the gentleman from New York to speak of one and to say that the party was convicted without evidence. I do not understand how far this resolution goes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution simply calls for information whether any American citizen has been arrested, tried, convicted, and imprisoned.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That being so, I see no objection to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. One word; I said that an American citizen had been tried and convicted without any evidence against him that he had done any act or said any word in Great Britain; it was exclusively on what he had said and done here.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rose to say that I hope we will not adopt the principle of passing upon the judgments of the British courts. Each nation must manage its own trials in its own way. We should be very unwilling to allow any other nation to decide whether the rebels had been guilty, even if some of them were subjects of a foreign Power, until we had tried them; and then I should object to their interference. But as the resolution is merely to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report on these facts, I can see no objection. It does not go quite as far as I thought it did.

The resolution was agreed to.

TAXING GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the burdens of the Government should be borne equally; that taxation should be in proportion to property held; that exemption of any material portion of the wealth of this country from its due proportion of taxes is wrongful, unjust, and should be avoided; and to carry out these views the right to tax bonds of the Government should be given in any future system funding said bonds.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, whether the effect of this resolution will not be this: to prevent the Government of the United States from funding all the different classes of securities that may bear different rates of interest, some running as high as seven-thirty. Would not it interfere with the consolidation of the national debt into a system of bonds bearing a less rate of interest than we are now paying?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I care not what the effect will be. I want an expression of opinion as to this question. I do not myself believe that it will affect the rate of interest upon our bonds.

Mr. COVODE. I suggest to the gentleman that the first part of his resolution would clearly look to the taxing of land as well as bonds. I suggest to him that if he does not want to tax land, he should make some distinction.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I wish to tax everything.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman wish to tax bonds which are now exempt from tax, ation?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I certainly do not wish to interfere with contracts already made.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution so that it will read: "Any future system of loaning," instead of "funding."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I cannot modify my resolution. I demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. No, sir, I cannot yield for any such purpose.

Mr. PILE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY ELECTION.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to present the protest of Hon. J. Proctor Knott, with accompanying papers. I move that they be referred to the Committee of Elections and printed, and also that they be printed in the Globe.

The motion was agreed to.

The documents are as follows:

To the honorable the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned would respectfully represent that on the 4th day of May, 1867, he was duly elected as the Representative of the fourth congressional district of Kentucky in the Fortieth Congress of the United States of America, in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the Commonwealth of Kentucky; a certificate whereof was awarded to him on the 25th day of May, 1867, by His Excellency Thomas E. Bramlette, Governor. Hon. John M. Harlan, Attorney General, and W. T. Samuels, Esq., Auditor of Public Accounts, of said Commonwealth, who constitute the board authorized by law to examine the returns of said election and grant said certificate. Provided with these credentials, the undersigned repaired to the city of Washington with a view of entering upon the discharge of his duties as such Representative during the present adjourned session of Congress, which convened on the 3d of the present month, but was surprised to find on his arrival that a question as to his right to take a seat as such had already been raised and referred to the Committee of Elections in his absence, although neither of his opponents, over whom he received a majority of nearly six thousand votes, and not one of his own constituents had interposed a solitary objection to his qualification, but simply upon the suggestion of a gentleman from another State—a suggestion which the undersigned is contented at present to say he feels assured the House will find, upon a knowledge of the facts, to have resulted from mistake, and that he has been guilty of no act inconsistent with his fealty to the Constitution and laws of his country, or the duty of a law-abiding citizen.

Although not admitting the regularity or right of this proceeding, the undersigned was satisfied to abide in patience the action of the committee and the wisdom of the House, and were he alone interested he might even now feel constrained to remain silent. Having, however, learned that on Monday, the 8th of the present month, the question as to his right to a seat was again referred to the Committee of Elections, and his district denied a representation until their report shall have been made and acted upon, notwithstanding the undersigned claims to possess all the qualifications presented by the Constitution for a Representative in Congress, and knows of no reason under any law of the United States why he should not be immediately sworn in, and lest his further silence might be construed as a commitment of either himself or his people to an acquiescence therein, he begs leave, with all proper deference to the opinions of those who may differ with him, to enter, in behalf of his constituents and himself, a respectful but firm and solemn protest against the action of the House in the premises, as irregular, unauthorized, and in derogation of the constitutional rights of those whom he claims the right to represent, as well as of the people of the entire Union.

Very respectfully,
J. PROCTOR KNOTT,
Member of Congress elect from the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky.

Mr. ADAMS. I also present the protest of Hon. Lawrence S. Trimble, Representative-elect from the first congressional district of Kentucky. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed in the Globe.

The motion was agreed to; and the following are the papers presented:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1867.

SIR: It is due to the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress with whom I served during that entire term, to the people whose partiality and confidence accredits me as their Representative in the Fortieth Congress, and to myself, that I should earnestly and respectfully enter my solemn denial to each and every charge affecting in any way my right to a seat in the Fortieth Congress of the United States.

Under the law governing contested elections, I have caused the following answer to the annexed notice to be served on G. G. Symes in this city, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, as follows, to wit:

The answer of L. S. Trimble, elected to the Fortieth Congress from the first district of Kentucky, to the notice of G. G. Symes, claiming his seat.

1. There are no specific charges or allegations in said notice of the time and place of the commission of the acts spoken of, nor the violations of the laws charged, to enable this respondent to prove their entire falsity, which he can do if advised of the particular acts relied upon with the time and place.

2. He denies that he ever was disloyal to the Constitution of the United States or the State of Kentucky. He denies aiding or abetting the rebellion, sending supplies, provisions, medicines, military equipments, and ammunition through the lines into the Confederate States during the war; that the whole of said first paragraph is false and calumnious. He denies making disloyal speeches; that in all of his speeches he advocated the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws passed in pursuance thereof as the last and only hope for the liberties of the people; at all times opposing secession and rebellion.

3. He denies that Union men were intimidated and overawed from voting by being threatened and proscribed by those lately in rebellion against the Government. But he charges that Democrats and Conservatives were threatened with reconstruction, confiscation, and military rule if they did not vote against this respondent and for the said Symes. This was openly and publicly done by Symes and his friends Anderson and Bollinger, whose affidavits have been taken ex parte and filed by said Symes; while last fall Symes was publicly denouncing Congress as a set of Jacobins and revolutionists when speaking at Johnson meetings, as I am informed.

4. He denies all charges of illegal voting for him or the illegality of the election, but says that said election was regularly held in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of Kentucky and the Constitution of the United States.

He denies that any person or persons, whether unpardoned ex-Confederate soldiers or paroled prisoners, voted for him who were not legally entitled to do so under the constitution and laws of the State of Kentucky, and asserts that each and all of the electors who cast their votes for him had all the qualifications required for electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, so far as he knows, believes, or has any information. And he denies that under any state of the case the majority received by this respondent could have been either overcome or materially reduced by the rejection even of all the votes claimed in the notice as illegal. This respondent received a majority of the votes polled in each and every county composing the said district, respondent receiving 9,787 votes, Symes 1,780 votes; respondent's majority being 8,007 votes.

Respondent denies each and all of the statements contained in the fourth specification in said notice, and denies that any of the judges, sheriffs, or clerks of said election at any precinct in said district were either illegally appointed or disqualified from any cause to act as such, or that any law was violated in that regard; he denies that the election laws were violated in any way.

Respondent denies that Christian county belongs to that district, or that respondent or Symes received any votes in that county, (Christian.) In conclusion, he denies that any of the matters contained in said notice can be sustained by the testimony of any witnesses who have any regard for truth.

Respectfully,
L. S. TRIMBLE.
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8, 1867.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
July 8, 1867.

I have this day given in hand to the within G. G. Symes a copy within notice.

N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

In the foregoing answer I have denied every charge contained in the notice. I now most respectfully protest against the right of Congress, or the Committee of Elections, to deprive this respondent of his seat, or to put him upon his defense, upon the ex parte and illegal evidence now before the Committee of Elections.

While I deny the truth of the charges, the legality of the ex parte affidavits, or the right to read them against me, and assert with confidence that they are malicious, false, and calumnious from the beginning to the end, still I am induced to believe upon a careful examination by your Committee, Elections of these affidavits of Anderson, Bollinger, Ellithrop, and others, your committee will so decide. Most of the statements, if admissible in any form, are hearsay, the weakest character of testimony admissible or known to the law. The conclusions of the witnesses surely are not competent anywhere.

Anderson's affidavit discloses the facts that at the time of the making of the speeches by respondent at Mayfield and Benton in May, 1863, respondent was a candidate for Congress against Anderson, that a short time after the meeting at Benton said learned that said Trimble had been arrested and taken to Henderson, Kentucky, by the military authorities.

The records show Anderson was admitted to the Thirty-Eighth Congress, not receiving, however, one-fifth of the legal votes of that district, most of them voting under the influence of threats against their lives, their liberty, and property. Respondent's name was stricken from the poll-books, his friends driven from the polls at the point of the bayonet, Trimble arrested, taken to Henderson, denied trial on charges being preferred against him, denied communication with any one, black or white, denied the benefit of counsel or privilege of conferring with them, or their admission to confer with him. All this at the instance and request of Anderson and Bollinger.

Foster's affidavit shows that respondent was released after the election without trial or charges of any kind being preferred against him, or even taking the oath so commonly required at that time, General Boyle ordering respondent to be released unconditionally. Had respondent violated any law or Treasury regulation prior to that time, with Anderson and Bollinger in power, he would have been tried and summarily dealt with, probably sharing the fate of many of their innocent victims butchered in cold blood, now sleeping the sleep that knows no waking.

The truth is respondent was arrested for no offense committed at that time or before, unless it be one to defend the Constitution and the Union as our fathers made it, the constitution and laws of the State of Kentucky, and the rights of the citizens thereof, but that Anderson might be foisted upon the people as their Representative against their will, and that Bollinger might more securely follow his avocation of robbing, pillaging, and plundering all who had money and did not descend to his standard of morals and loyalty.

Neither Anderson nor Bollinger pretend in their affidavits to give the substance of the speeches made by your respondent at Mayfield or Benton. But each gives a few lines without their connection or true meaning, showing clearly their fiendish malice toward this respondent, with their calumnious conclusions, which cannot be evidence anywhere.

Respondent refers you to the following letter of Governor Bramlette to President Lincoln, also the following extracts from the report of Generals Speed S. Fry and John Mason Brown, who were appointed by Major General Burbridge to investigate the military affairs in Western Kentucky. The high character and loyalty of these gentlemen will not be questioned.

FRANKFORT, September 2, 1864.

SIR: Brigadier General Paine, by military order, has banished a number of the best citizens from Western Kentucky. I send you a copy of a letter handed me by Colonel Taylor, which contains a fair statement of the cases of those embraced therein. I have taken pains to inquire into the facts in relation to those banished persons, and learn from good and reliable men that those persons mentioned in the letter of William McKee Hubbard have ever been loyal to the Government. The order ought to be forthwith annulled and those persons restored to their homes and to the property which General Paine and his confederates, Hon. Lucien Anderson and Bollinger, have iniquitously extorted from them. Having instituted some inquiry into the conduct of General Paine, Lucien Anderson, and Bollinger, who it appears are confederates in the system of oppression and plundering instituted in that part of Kentucky—sharing the spoils iniquitously extorted from citizens—I charge him and them, as the chief executive of Kentucky, with a corrupt and oppressive use of his office to oppress unjustly and extort corruptly money and property from the citizens for their own private gain and to the disgrace of the service and injury of the public interests. The extent and character of the oppressions and plundering carried on by these men, as related to me by persons cognizant of the facts, is absolutely astounding. I ask in behalf of justice, the honor of our country, that a military commission, composed of good, brave, just, and fearless men, be appointed to inquire into the conduct of these men. I have forbore to complain until I could be assured of the verity of these charges.

Respectfully,

THOMAS E. BRAMLETTE,
Governor of Kentucky.

Extracts from the Report of General Speed S. Fry, and John M. Brown's Report to Major General Burbridge, pages 27 and 31.

It is proper here to state that General Paine was chiefly advised by the following persons, to each of whom particular reference will be made hereafter: Hon. Lucien Anderson, member of Congress; John F. Bollinger.

Your committee distinctly and deliberately charge that these men and each of them, except Ridd, are guilty of corruption, bribery, and malfeasance in office. The case of Bollinger will be first alluded to as belonging to the trade policy of Brigadier General Paine during the time that General Paine's tax on tobacco and cotton was in full force. Bollinger (J. T.) shipped, as his own affidavit shows, about 142 hogheads of tobacco and 84 bales of cotton. The total sum paid by him as fees and permits was $10, as will appear from his own affidavit, and that of J. E. Woodward. But in addition to this peculiar exemption, it will be seen from the sworn statements of L. T. Bradley, master of the Government steamer Convey, that a Government steamer was put at Bollinger's disposal for the purpose of bringing his cotton and tobacco from a point where he had collected it, and that United States soldiers were detailed for the fatigue duty of loading it into the boats. So thoroughly was the community convinced of Anderson, Bollinger, Hall, Ridd, and Bartley, with Brigadier General Paine, that a lucrative trade in vouchers of loyalty and intercession had already sprung up when your committee arrived, and in some instances heavy sums were paid for permits, which, if admissible, should have been freely granted; if improper, should have, of course, been refused.

From page 31 your committee have but briefly alluded to the facts that will appear more fully in the paper which accompanies this report. They beg leave to particularize the parties in their judgment who are most culpable, and name—

1. Hon. Lucien Anderson, member of Congress; a reference to a statement of this person made before your committee, under oath, and numbered 120, which clearly shows his complicity with Major Bartley, provost marshal.

SPEED S. FRY, Brigadier General
United States Army, President Committee.

JOHN MASON BROWN,
Colonel Forty-Fifth Kentucky Volunteer Mounted Infantry, Commanding second Brigade, first Division Military District of Kentucky.

As to the credibility and general character of Anderson and Bollinger, I submit these papers without further comment.

William F. Elletthop says in his affidavit that on or about the 1st of June, 1861, L. S. Elletthop & Co., (of which firm he was a member), D. A. Given, L. M. Flournoy, and L. S. Trimble, formed a partnership for the purpose of in substance carrying on a general smuggling business in sundry bacon, flour, whisky, and other articles through the Federal lines and selling them to the agents of the so-called confederate States, in violation of the laws and regulations of the Treasury Department then existing. It must be known, for it is a historical fact, that Tennessee at that time was still in the Union. Not until long after that time did Governor Harris and his associates pretend to claim that by vote of the people or his (Harris) proclamation Tennessee had severed her connection with the Federal Government. On the 1st of June, 1861, no meeting of the Thirty-Seventh Congress had taken place. Nor did that Congress meet until the 4th of July, 1861. At that time, the 1st of June, 1861, no law had passed Congress in any manner interfering with the commerce between the States, or between Kentucky and Tennessee, or authorizing the President by proclamation so to do. On the 13th day of July, 1861 and August, 16, 1861, Congress authorized the President by proclamation to interfere when in his judgment it was expedient. On the 16th day of August, 1861, the President issued an order suspending the commercial relations between some of the States, of which you must have judicial knowledge. All of which occurred long after the time Elletthop says he and others were violating these laws and Treasury regulations under them. The truth is, on that day, June 1, 1861, respondent was the Union Democratic candidate for Congress, (the Thirty-Seventh,) against Hon. H. C. Burnett, which canvass he prosecuted almost day and night until the election on the 20th of June, 1861, with the energy and ability he possessed, being one of the most exciting contests in the State, or that ever occurred in that district. Considered a forlorn hope, and after all others had declined the honor, with defeat inevitable, respondent, espousing and advocating the cause of the Union party in Kentucky, with their principles and platforms as announced at Louisville by James Speed and others, opposing secession and rebellion. As to the manner or the perils and danger attending that canvass I will not speak; it is a part of the political history of that district.

While respondent was thus engaged, Elletthop and many of the persons who are now slandering and persecuting respondent, were engaged in yelling for Jeff Davis and swearing respondent ought to be hung for opposing Davis and secession. Many who voted for Symes were engaged in the same business.

Elletthop nowhere states that respondent was present or knew of these transactions, except when the copartnership was formed, on or about the 1st of June, 1861, which is positively false, although there was no law of the character spoken of to be evaded or violated at that time.

It must be apparent to every impartial mind, from the whole tenor of Elletthop's affidavit, that he establishes beyond cavil his own corruption and infamy. Your ignorance of his infamous character alone renders this comment necessary. Not content with slandering me, he seeks to render infamous the memory of his dead brothers, D. W. and L. S. Elletthop. D. W. Elletthop, as I understand, was at that time in the secret service of the United States, and continued in that service until the close of the war, as the rolls in the War Office will show.

To make any statements made by respondent to any one evidence against him, the witness must show and state all that was said upon the subject at that time. No rule of law can be clearer than this.

For reasons then obvious to my friends, and because I had the right to leave, respondent was absent from that section of the country from the 20th of June, 1861, with the exception of four or five days, and remained absent until some two weeks after the occupation of Paducah by General Grant, on the 6th of September, 1861. Even if it were legal for respondent to disprove the statements made in the ex parte affidavits already submitted to the committee by counter-affidavits, or to be finally settled in that way, he has had no time to do so, and therefore contents himself for the present with the foregoing, with entire confidence as to the result ending in his triumphant vindication from these calumnies and his undoubted right to a seat in the Fortieth Congress.

I had hoped before the action of the committee on yesterday to have met the committee and presented my objections to their action with this communication.

I now respectfully ask that the same, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. S. TRIMBLE.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ADAMS. I also present a communication of Mr. John D. Young, in response to Mr. Samuel McKee's notice of intention to contest his right to a seat as a Representative from the ninth district of Kentucky.

The communication was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed in the Globe. It is as follows:

OWINGSVILLE, BATH COUNTY, KENTUCKY,
June 24, 1867.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt on the 15th instant of your notice of intention to contest my right to a seat in the Fortieth Congress as member for the ninth district, and your reasons for so doing. After your explicit declaration to me, before a large and intelligent audience at Maysville, that you would not contest my right to a seat in Congress if I should be elected by a majority of the legal voters of the district, and your equally explicit recognition of the right of returned rebels under the Constitution and laws of Kentucky to vote at the election, you will pardon me if I express my surprise at your want of good faith, and your open violation of your pledges to the people, in this attempt to obtain a place in Congress, which the people of the district refused so decidedly to award you. As I intend to maintain by every fair and honorable means the right of this people to be represented in Congress by the man of their choice, and my right by virtue of their suffrages to be that Representative; and as the act of Congress in regard to contested elections imposes upon me the duty of replying to your notice of its specifications, I shall proceed to do so with all the freedom which truth and justice will warrant.

In answer to your first assignment of reasons, I deny there is one word of truth in your charge, that I did not remain loyal to the Government during the rebellion, or that I voluntarily or otherwise gave aid, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; or that I was in full sympathy, free accord, or entire harmony with such persons. That I did sympathize with the people of the South in their misfortunes, privations, and sufferings I do not deny. I must have rooted out of my own heart the common sentiments of humanity to have been capable of feeling otherwise. With this exception, I pronounce all and every part of said charge false, scandalous, and unjust. Nor is it true that in 1861, or at any other time, I avowed myself in favor of raising or arming troops in Kentucky to resist the Federal Government, in case that the President sent an army South to coerce and compel obedience upon the part of the southern people and States to the laws of the United States; nor did I countenance, advise, counsel, or encourage, in the county of Bath or elsewhere, the raising or recruiting of men for the purpose of resisting the authority and laws of the United States; or aid, countenance, counsel, or encourage persons who did array themselves in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or contribute to the same at any time or place. On the contrary, upon all proper occasions I advised persons who manifested a disposition to enter into the rebellion not to do so.

It is true, I voted for John S. Williams for Congress in 1861; but I deny that the vote I then gave can be construed into an act of disloyalty then or now. John S. Williams was not then a disunion or secession candidate, nor did I vote for him as such. He occupied a position then occupied by some of the best Union men of the State. Your charge that I voluntarily gave information by which Union soldiers were captured by armed bands of rebels is scandalously false, vile, and disgraceful; but I will not, from self-respect, characterize my denial by the use of such indignant terms as its injustice and wantonness would fairly authorize. I shall content myself with saying—for I will not assume that you invented the slander—that whosoever informed you I so acted is a knave and calumniator. It is not true I voted for Charles A. Wickliffe in 1863; nor was I in the convention by which he was nominated. It is not true that Governor Wickliffe was a disloyal man; nor can the party which nominated and supported him be justly considered traitors or treasonable. If I had voted for him it would have been with no disloyal intent; nor would such a vote have afforded any pretext or justification for your untruthful aspersions of my fidelity and loyalty to the Government and its Constitution and laws. I cast no vote from 1861 until 1865, when I voted for Colonel Smith Hurt for Congress and B. D. Lacy, Esq., for the Legislature, the former a Union officer, who had served gallantly four years in the Army, and the latter a well-known and leading Union man of Bath county. Your denunciations, therefore, of Governor Wickliffe and the party by which he was nominated and supported as "treasonable and traitorous" have no application to me, were inconsiderate and irrelevant, and need no further notice. In reference to your charge that when summoned in 1862 by the United States authorities to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States I refused and fled to Canada, Province is false in fact and inference. I never refused to take the oath of allegiance when rightfully required to do so, nor did I flee to Canada. I was a precinct officer, had taken the oath, and never in thought or deed have violated it. I went to Vermont when threatened with illegal arrest and imprisonment for the discharge of an official duty in issuing a writ of habeas corpus when rightfully applied for.

Your inference that none but disloyal men could be required to take oaths of allegiance or be threatened with arrest is as ridiculous as most of your accusations against me are false. The distinguished examples of Colonel Wolford, General Huston, Colonel Jacob, and many other good Union men might well be quoted to your discomfiture. These men are truly loyal, as you so noisily and boastfully pretend to be, and yet they did not escape ignominious imprisonment nor shameful persecution. Your next charge is that in 1861 I voted and acted with the secession and disunion party, and in addition to voting for John S. Williams I voted for Dr. Thomas C. Parish, who ran as the secession candidate for the Legislature, and that I was loud in my denunciations of the Government of the United States, and declared myself freely for secession and the southern confederacy. To this accusation I interpose an emphatic denial, in whole and in part, except that I did vote for Dr. Parish. The question of disunion was not then at issue, and I understood and believe Dr. Parish was not a secession candidate. I did not hear either of the gentlemen upon the stump. You conclude your first specification of reasons why you are entitled to be admitted to represent a people who refused to choose you by asserting that during the late canvass I declared I left the county in 1862, for the reason I could not and would not take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, because I was in favor of secession and desired the rebellion to succeed. I hope you do not make this charge upon any knowledge you claim to have derived from our intercourse during the canvass, for you know well it would be an unmitigated falsehood if so founded; and if you derived it from others I can assure you your informants have been guilty of audacious falsehood. I made no such statements during the canvass or at any other time; the whole charge is a malicious and wanton falsehood.

You conclude by saying that for these reasons I am disqualified by the Constitution and laws of the United States from holding any office of trust or profit thereunder, and in consequence thereof the votes cast for me on the 4th of May were and are void and my election a nullity. You are certainly "a most wise and learned judge," and well read in the Constitution of your country, and can readily point out the provision of that instrument which makes either or all of the acts alleged, even if they were true, a disqualification. You will do me and the country a favor if you will condescend to indicate where such a provision may be found. No lawyer or statesman has discerned it, and if you will only refer me to it I will with unalloyed pleasure proclaim you a sage lawyer and profound statesman. Your second specification of your reasons why you should be admitted to take a seat in Congress, which the people of your district refused to elect, is, to wit, that returned rebels "who have been and still are exempt from amnesty and pardon, to the number justly exceeding that of my reported majority, to wit, more than two thousand," voted for me in the various precincts of the district, and that such votes were illegal and are void. You give unusual prominence to this charge, and repeat it in your third specification. You rely upon it as possibly the most certain and conclusive in your array of reasons for my exclusion from the office and position to which I have been elevated by the free and unbiased suffrages of the people of my congressional district. Like all the rest of your reckless allegations, it happens not to be sustained by the truth. Returned rebels did not vote for me to the number alleged, nor to one third that number. I have taken some pains to ascertain myself upon that subject, and if the votes of that character received by me in the whole district exceed 650 I am greatly mistaken. Some voted for you, and if they must not be illegal when cast for me, surely they must not be counted when cast for you. But after your acknowledgment at Maysville that the constitution and laws of Kentucky made them legal voters, with what force can you now declare them illegal and void? The right of suffrage in Kentucky is regulated by the constitution and laws of Kentucky, and no other authority on earth has the power to enlarge, diminish, or control that right. The Constitution of the United States, to which you sometimes condescend to refer, provides that "the electors for members of Congress in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature;" thus recognizing the right of the State, and no other authority, to determine the qualifications of the voters within the State, both for Federal and State officers. The returned rebels in Kentucky were good voters under the constitution and laws of Kentucky for any officer in Kentucky, "the most numerous branch of the State Legislature" as well as all others; and if they had the right so to vote under the laws and constitution of Kentucky and the Constitution of the United States, they have an undoubted right to cast their votes for me as Congressmen.

Your third specification is but a repetition of the second, and is sufficiently responded to above. Your fourth ground of contest is, that fraud, intimidation, and violence were practiced in various counties and the precincts of counties on the day of the election by my friends, and that by reason thereof many Union men, who otherwise would have voted for you, were prevented from doing so; that armed men, who had been in the rebel army, were present at the polls, and threatened to murder Union men and destroy their property if they voted the Union ticket (i. e., for you); and that by such threats and violence many men who would have voted for you were deterred from doing so, and the election was not, therefore, "free and equal," but illegal and void. I have no personal knowledge of any such fraud, violence, or intimidation, and, until your notice, never heard of anything of the kind having occurred in any county or precinct. Having every reason to know that every material thing contained in your former charges was false and untrue, I do not hesitate to say that this charge is equally false and unfounded. In your fifth specification you charge that at each voting place in the district illegal votes were polled for me, to a number greater than my reported majority; and that votes offered for you, which were legal, were refused. This is unqualifiedly false. I know of no illegal votes cast for me in any part of the district, nor of any legal votes offered for you which were refused. The recklessness of your allegations and the desperation of your cause are well illustrated by the character of this charge. You assert that in each voting place of the district I received illegal votes to a greater number than my majority, when you well know that at no single voting place was that number of votes cast for either one or both candidates of any kind, legal or illegal.

In regard to your sixth charge and specifications, that the laws of the State were not complied with in the appointment of officers who conducted the election in various counties and precincts, and that the men selected were not qualified to act, and that their acts were fraudulent and void, I say the charge is false in all its particulars, and deny that in consequence of the action of said officers any votes were prevented from being cast for you which otherwise you would have received, or that there was any illegality in said election.

To the seventh and eighth charges, without repeating them here, I interpose an unqualified denial, and say they are false and unfounded in each and every particular. As to the ninth of your charges and specifications, that the freedom of the canvass was not permitted to you and your friends, and that in certain counties of the district you and your friends were not permitted to speak in advocacy of your election, and that you were compelled to be accompanied by an armed force to defend your life from the threatened violence of my friends, it is a flagrant falsehood and slander. If you took armed men with you to the several speaking places in the district, it was not because of any threatened violence upon the part of my friends, but because of your own intemperate and insolent conduct, which was well calculated to provoke resentment and violence. Instead of your being prohibited in any part of the district from the utmost freedom of discussion, you were permitted to speak everywhere without molestation, and were listened to with great attention, although your speeches were characterized by the most bitter malignancy toward your political adversaries ever shown by a public speaker. You vilified, slandered, and abused the Democratic party wherever you spoke, and it is only a wonder that a brave and free people showed so much gentlemanly forbearance and moderation under such provocation.

You claim that Colonel Baker was not allowed to speak in your favor at Germantown. Colonel Baker went there to speak for himself, he being a candidate for Lieutenant Governor, and not particularly for you. He was not prevented from speaking. The whole story is a base fabrication, and was exposed by men of your own party at that time. He did not speak at Germantown, simply because there was no audience to hear him, not because my friends or any other party prevented him by threats or otherwise.

Your tenth and last charge assumes that, excluding illegal votes cast for me, you had a majority of the legal voters in the district and are therefore rightfully elected. This is not true; but I affirm that of the legal votes cast in the district I have a much larger majority than that ascertained by the board of examiners. Many illegal votes were cast for you in all the counties, and these were procured by fraud, intimidation, bribery, and corruption.

Against your unfounded charges and in resistance of your arrogant claim to have and hold the position to which the people of the district refused to elect you, I shall maintain that I have been fairly elected by a decided majority of the votes cast at the election held on 4th day of May last for member of the Fortieth Congress from the ninth district of Kentucky; that the returns of election to said office have been duly made and approved by the officers appointed by law to receive and decide them; that I have all the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States, being twenty-five years of age, a native citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State of Kentucky at the time of my election, and am entitled to take and occupy my seat under said Constitution. I deny that Congress has any right to enlarge or abridge, add to or take from said qualifications, or that I can be made amenable to any act of Congress requiring other or different qualifications than those prescribed by said Constitution. Even conceding that Congress has such a power, I deny that I have done or committed any act which brings me within the proscriptive provisions of any of its enactments in regard to members of that body. And now, having fully met and answered each and every allegation you have made against me as affecting my right to hold the position to which I have been elected by the people, and asserted my claim as the member rightfully chosen, permit me to notify you that I will prove and rely upon the following facts as reasons why you ought not to be permitted to take a seat in the Fortieth Congress as a member from the ninth district:

First. You were not elected by a majority of the qualified voters of that district, but were defeated by a majority of 1,479 of the legal electors.

Second. Many of the votes which you received at the various election places in the counties of Lewis, Greenup, Morgan, Rowan, Carter, Boyd, Magoffin, Pike, and Johnson, and other voting places in this district were procured for you by bribery, corruption, purchase, and fraud.

Third. Because you and your friends, in violation of the laws of the State of Kentucky, and in fraud of my rights as a candidate, expended large sums of money in the counties named in the preceding paragraph, to debauch and corrupt the electors, and by which means you procured to be cast many votes in said counties for you which otherwise would have been cast for me.

Fourth. You took with you to the places of discussion in the several counties an armed body of reckless and violent men, under the pretense of protecting you from alleged threatened violence, but in fact and in truth to overawe and intimidate the electors of the district from casting their votes in accordance with their own free sentiments, and by which immoral, illegal, and violent practice many men in the same counties were constrained to vote for you who otherwise would have cast their votes for me.

Fifth. You were accompanied at various of your appointments in the several counties of this district by officers of the Federal Government, clothed with power and patronage, and who went with you to aid in controlling public sentiment in this district, and thus brought the power and patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections.

Sixth. In the various precincts of the several counties in the district illegal votes were cast for you by men not of the proper age, by men not having the proper residence, by men not naturalized, and by men whose votes were bought by money and obtained by threats, intimidations, and violence, to a number in the aggregate greater than the ex-rebel votes cast for me.

Very respectfully,
HON. SAMUEL MCKEE.

JOHN D. YOUNG.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BINGHAM asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. ECKLEY, on account of the death of his son.

Mr. MCCARTHY asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for three days.

Mr. SPALDING asked and obtained leave of absence for himself after this week.

BUILDINGS LEASED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BARNES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, respectively, be requested to furnish this House with the number of buildings leased by their respective Departments in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, with the location, size, and cubic feet of measurement, and capacity of each building, the time and duration of each lease, the amount paid for each building, and the amount received from each, if any.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution by substituting "directed" for "requested."

The SPEAKER. It is customary in resolutions of this character to "direct" the heads of Departments and to "request" the President.

Mr. BARNES. I modify my resolution in the manner suggested.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the tax on distilled spirits be reduced from two dollars per gallon to seventy-five cents per gallon, under the same regulations, provisions, and measurements as now exist.

Resolved, That this act take effect immediately.

Mr. SPALDING, Mr. BROOMALL, and others objected.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of Ann Burnett.

HONORABLE DISCHARGES OF SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the granting of honorable discharges to certain soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed, and printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill just introduced was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why could not that bill be taken up now?

The SPEAKER. It will require a two-thirds vote to discharge the committee and bring the bill before the House, as it is general legislation.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs the bill introduced by me for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill which I have introduced is for the purpose of relieving certain deserters of the penalties of their desertion. My colleague introduced the other day a bill upon the same subject, which is within the control of the House, if it be the disposition of members, as I trust it will be, to take it up on the motion which he entered and now calls up, to reconsider the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. In the mean time we have gone over that bill, and it has been so modified by the one introduced by myself and by suggestions made by others that in the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs it may be considered and passed now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope, then, that the bill will be taken up and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope my friend will sustain the motion to reconsider, so that the bill may be brought before the House and considered now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a majority can reconsider and bring the bill before the House, but it will take a two-thirds vote to consider the subject, as it is general legislation.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules and put it upon its passage.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order, as to whether the resolution we passed some days ago does not absolutely preclude any general legislation?

The SPEAKER. It does preclude general legislation, and none can be entertained except by a suspension of the rules previous to its consideration. They can be suspended by a two-thirds vote during this session.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I merely wished to know how far we can proceed in general legislation.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion to recommit, and move to suspend the rules, so as to put the bill on its passage. The Committee on Military Affairs, as well as the delegation from Ohio, are unanimously in favor of the passage of the bill. I believe that almost every member of the House is in favor of it.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. HARDING. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I submit the following substitute:

A bill for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated.

Whereas a large number of men who voluntarily enlisted in the service of the United States for a definite period or during the war, and who faithfully served until after the surrender of Lee and Johnston, in April, 1865, under the impression that they had faithfully fulfilled their contract with the Government, did, without authority, leave their respective commands and go home; and whereas all who thus left the service are marked upon the rolls as deserters, and are unjustly classed with those guilty of the great crime of deserting to the enemy or deserting during the war: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no soldier or sailor shall be taken or held to be a deserter from the Army or Navy who voluntarily enlisted to serve and who did faithfully serve the prescribed period of his enlistment, or until after the surrender of Lee, near Richmond, Virginia, on the 19th of April, 1865, and who, without proper authority or leave first obtained, did quit their respective commands after said surrender.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer soldier or sailor who may at any time have absented himself from the service, and who voluntarily returned to duty and remained with his proper command until it was regularly mustered out, shall not be classed as a deserter.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as they may prescribe, to cause all applications of soldiers or sailors, of the class hereinbefore described as deserters, asking for a correction of the rolls, or to be reinstated, which may be hereafter presented to their respective Departments, to be examined, and if it shall be found that the applicant voluntarily entered the service, and faithfully served the term of his enlistment, or until the 19th day of April, 1865, and only left the service after said date, his name shall be replaced upon the rolls, and he shall be entitled to his pay up to the day he so left the service; but he shall not receive any additional or extra pay. He shall also be entitled to a discharge, setting forth the facts as they exist; and the persons thus reinstated, paid, and discharged shall not be subject to any penalty, disability, or forfeiture of citizenship as a deserter.

Mr. RAUM. I ask to submit an amendment, which is necessary to cover the cases of dishonorable discharges. I move to add the following:

And be it further enacted, That all dishonorable discharges given to any soldier or sailor included within the provisions of this act are hereby vacated and set aside, and such soldiers and sailors shall be entitled to discharges and pay as other soldiers and sailors under this act.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Let that amendment be pending. I move to strike out in the first section the words "surrender of Lee" and to insert "the 19th day of April."

The modification was accordingly made.

Mr. COBB. I move to insert after the words "mustered out" in section two these words: "or who was killed in battle or died before the expiration of his term of service."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As this is a bill in which every one is interested, I move that it be postponed till to-morrow after the reading of the Journal, and that, together with the amendments submitted, it shall be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following amendment, to cover another class of cases. During the war occasionally a soldier dropped out of the ranks in consequence of sickness and was unable to join his command, and subsequently was returned on the rolls as a deserter. That soldier may for months have been unable to join his command and may be returned on the rolls as a deserter although he may have had no intention to desert. I move the following:

And be it further enacted, That when any soldier or sailor in the late war, whose name is entered upon the rolls of the Army or Navy as a deserter, shall present to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy satisfactory proof that such desertion was only technical and without any intention to abandon the service, the Secretary is in such case authorized and directed to give such soldier or sailor a certificate of correction of the entry in his case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is the law now.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the substitute will be considered as the original bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to offer an amendment, which is intended to cover the case of a regiment from my own State which were declared in default for refusing to serve, dishonorably discharged, and their pay withheld.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman can offer it to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARDING. My amendment is to add a new section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That forfeiture of pay and dishonorable discharge promised or made for refusing to serve after said period are hereby released, and soldiers and officers subjected to said forfeitures and findings shall be paid and their discharges given as they would have been entitled to receive if no refusal to serve had been made.

Mr. MUNGEN. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] in regard to the law against desertion. A case in point occurred in regard to some members of my own regiment. A few of the boys went on shore at Vicksburg. The boats were ordered off sooner than they expected and the result was they were captured by rebel cavalry. One of the men was taken to Jackson, Mississippi, and there kept until our forces occupied that place. For some reason he is reported as a deserter, but I have the affidavit of his captain, lieutenant, and of myself showing that he was not even reprimanded while in the service. He joined us at Kenosha mountain and was discharged at Little Rock. I have tried in vain so far to get his bounty and get justice done him. His name is stricken off the roll, although he got an honorable discharge.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The second section of this bill provides for that case exactly.

Mr. MUNGEN. If the bill meets that case that is all I want.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now move that the bill and pending amendments be postponed till to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a question of privilege. The House at the March session passed a resolution requesting the Committee on the Judiciary to report upon the impeachment case, so-called, at the present session. It is proper that the committee should make some response to that resolution. I am therefore directed by the committee to state that they are not prepared to submit a report at this session, but will be prepared to do so at any session which may be held on or after the 16th day of October next.

I have also been requested to state the position occupied by the committee upon this question. As the case now stands five members of the committee are of opinion that such high crimes and misdemeanors have not been developed as to call for the exercise of the impeachment power on the part of this House. Four members occupy the opposite position, believing that sufficient matter has been developed in the case to call for the exercise of the impeachment power. This is all I am directed to say, and covers all the authority given to me by the committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the chairman of the committee has stated to the House, and in conformity to the suggestion of the committee, although not strictly by the authority of the committee, but I believe in accordance with the judgment of a majority of it, I submit to the House a resolution with reference to the adjournment of the present session.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman makes a statement a little outside of the committee when he says it is in conformity to the suggestion of the committee. The committee did not make any suggestion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, then, on my own responsibility I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on the — day of July, instant, the adjournment shall be to Wednesday, the 16th day of October next, at noon, and the two Houses shall then reassemble without further order.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House the reasons which control me in asking a session of Congress in the month of October next. There are general reasons which certainly are as well known to other members of the House as they are to me, which lead me to the opinion on which I presume that the House would be willing to act, that in the present condition of public affairs, in reference to what we have learned from the acts of the Chief Magistrate, it is due to the country and to the public peace, especially in the ten States that are not represented here, and in reference to business affairs throughout the whole country, that there should not be an interval of two months between the sessions of Congress until the people have had an opportunity, if there be no other method provided under the Constitution and the laws, to place in the executive chair another man.

But I do not propose now to dwell upon the general considerations, but to suggest to the House and to the country, it may be, a view of this matter which it seems to me ought to control us in deciding that there shall be another session of Congress as early as October next.

I know very well that a session will be inconvenient to members; it may be inconvenient, in some respects, to the country. I know how common it is, how universal I may say it is, for those interested in business to object to additional meetings of Congress. I am as anxious for peace as any man interested in business can possibly be, but there were those during the war who were clamoring for peace when there could be no peace except through the triumph of our arms and the supremacy of the cause for which we were contending. The same difficulty exists to-day. This controversy I suppose will be protracted, in some form or other, until the 4th of March, 1869. It is one of the incidents of the condition of the country, emerging, as it is, from a state of war, and there are no possible means, I do not say consistent with public duty, but I say that there are no possible means, whether we regard or disregard our public duties, by which we can relieve the country from the difficulties which are incident to the state of affairs growing out of the condition of the public business. I therefore suggest to the House and to the country that there is no better way in which we can rid ourselves of the difficulties in which we are involved than to go steadily, firmly, conscientiously, and judiciously forward in the discharge of our public and private duties. I wish to say, in addition to what was said by the chairman of the committee, that while the committee voted as has been stated on the main question of impeachment, a majority of the committee agreed that the President had been, I will not say guilty, but had so conducted himself in his public office as to justify the committee in their report in condemning and censuring him.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts shall be understood just as this subject was understood in the committee. He will remember very well that there were no propositions to report a resolution of censure or otherwise, because the committee were of the opinion that that question was not submitted to them. The question before the committee was whether the President should be impeached or not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I believe, if the gentleman will recall my words, they will sustain exactly the view he now presents. That report was to be so framed as to convey censure upon the conduct of the President.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would suggest to the gentleman that we had better wait for the report of the committee on this subject. I do not desire myself in advance to discuss any one of the issues involved in this case, nor do I wish now to place any interpretation upon the action or the position occupied by any member of the committee, or to attempt to interpret his views at this time. I will be prepared to do that when I am called upon to report upon this question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to make no reference to the views or the opinions of members of the committee. I did not intend to comment upon the views of the majority of the committee, or upon the views of any member of the committee further than to say this, which I think I am justified in saying, that if there had not been grave matters developed by the testimony taken before the committee they would not have adopted the resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many things in the course of action pursued by the President of which, as every one knows, I do not approve. But, sir, in reference to that and the general question suggested by the remarks of the gentleman I do not wish now to go into any discussion, though I shall be prepared to discuss it at the proper time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Nor do I, Mr. Speaker, wish to pursue this line of inquiry. But, sir, I will say upon my own responsibility and upon the judgment, I think, of those of the committee who concur with me in regard to the gravity of this question, that the House and the country are in such a position that this subject must be considered by the House. The report of the committee will be made. It must be considered; it must be discussed. Time will be required for that consideration and discussion. And I think in connection with what we know of the probable business of the next session, setting aside all other general considerations, the two Houses ought to meet as early as the middle of October for the purpose of attending to this business and discharging their duties in reference to other matters of public importance. If the commencement of the session be delayed until December, or if it be delayed even until November, and we are to go through with this inquiry upon the floor of the House, even if the proceeding goes no further, it will occupy, certainly, several weeks of time. We know there is to be a presidential election next year. It will be for the public interest as well as for the convenience of members that the business of the session should be closed if possible before the country is deeply involved in that struggle. I have, therefore, named the 16th of October—a time beyond the October elections. I am aware that there are States in which elections are to be held in November; but if we consent to postpone the session until November, it is substantially, so far as regards business, a postponement until the annual meeting in December. I may say further that, considering that the great question which is to come before Congress at its next session is one which specially belongs to the House of Representatives primarily under the Constitution of the United States, we may reasonably expect that the other branch of the legislative department will not, under these circumstances, undertake to exercise an independent judgment upon the question of the reassembling of Congress.

Now, sir, unless there be some desire to discuss this question further, I will call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will do so.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the sense of a majority of this House that an adjournment should take place until the 16th of October, with a view then to assemble and commence a long session, to run through the winter and into the next spring and summer. But I do believe that a majority would be prepared to join with the gentleman in a resolution similar in form to that under which we are now assembled, to meet again on the 16th day of October, provided a quorum of each House should then appear; if not, that we then adjourn until the first Monday of December. I move, therefore, that this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report a resolution similar in form to the one under which we are now convened, adjourning the two Houses to the 16th of October, to meet then, provided a quorum of each branch shall be present. Perhaps the gentleman will accept that as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not accept that amendment. And, Mr. Speaker, I will say that after the recent adjournment of Congress I, with some other persons better skilled in such subjects than myself, examined the Constitution in reference to the terms of the resolution of adjournment under which we have lately met, and I am persuaded, as are many others, that the provisions of that resolution are unconstitutional; that Congress has no right to impose such restrictions upon the two Houses when assembled under the Constitution. Such a resolution, I think, is only an invitation to a minority, if no more should assemble, to undertake to force a quorum. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I should object to a resolution in that form.

Mr. SPALDING. Then, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of getting the sense of the House upon this question of an adjournment definitely until the 16th of October, I move that the resolution be laid on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I decline to yield at present for that motion.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I will make the motion as soon as the gentleman surrenders the floor.

The SPEAKER. It will then be in order.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to offer an amendment providing for an adjournment till the second Monday in November. I for one prefer to make square work and adjourn definitely so that all the members may know exactly when we are to meet, that there may be no doubt in the mind of anybody. And although the time I propose is nominally hastening the meeting of Congress according to the Constitution, still I think it will be found when we come together, the Senate and the House, on the 11th of November, that we will have gained probably at least a month more than we should have done if we met on the first Monday in December. We all know when Congress comes together in December, and particularly at a long session, that the members come to the conclusion that nothing will be done before the holidays; and coming to that conclusion before they come here they are quite unwilling to stay except so far as public decency may require. An adjournment is then taken over the holidays as far as possible. If we adjourn to the 11th of November we will go to work and take up this whole subject of impeachment, or any other subject legitimately before the House. For that reason, and to test the sense of the House, I ask the gentleman to let me move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PIKE. Then I hope that the call for the previous question will not be seconded, so that we may test the sense of the House on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why this adjournment should take place unless we are to have a report from this committee of the evidence taken and have it printed and before us so that we may examine it. If I understood the chairman of that committee there is nothing now before them which will justify an impeachment, and that they have been six months attempting to find ground for an impeachment. Then, sir, the whole question of impeachment lies in a nutshell. If nothing can be found which sufficiently implicates him to put him on his trial before the country, it is due to him, it is due to this House and to the country that that committee should be discharged and this matter should be abandoned.

I do not quite agree, sir, that there is no sympathy with the action of the committee. I think the country almost unanimously believes that there ought to be articles of impeachment reported and acted on; and the only condition on which I shall agree to vote for an adjournment to the time mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts is that this committee shall report now, and that that report shall be printed and ready for our action when we do meet. I do not know, sir, whether it would be in order to submit a resolution of this kind directing the committee to report, and that that report shall be printed.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be done by a separate resolution. It could not be offered to a resolution for adjournment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I am not satisfied. I do not believe the country is satisfied with the course taken in regard to the impeachment. I do not mean thereby to censure or blame anybody, but it seems to me there is an error of judgment as to what is required by the law to found an impeachment. I think that ought to be submitted to the tribunal of this House and to the tribunal which is to try it; and if the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts should prevail, I shall ask leave to test the sense of the House on the question of directing that the committee shall report now. When I say now, I mean at this session; and that the report and the evidence taken shall be printed and ready for our action. As the question now stands I have nothing further to suggest.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I feel constrained to say a word. I have not agreed to the decision as enunciated by the chairman. I do not agree there is any reason why that committee should not have been prepared to make its report at this session.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the committee is not now expecting witnesses before it?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; the witnesses to whom the gentleman refers were examined this morning, and he would have heard them if he had been there. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. It is true I was not with the committee this morning; but I ask whether there are not other witnesses expected before the committee; some who have not been there, and others who have and have been recalled? I ask whether there is not a vast amount of evidence and other information called for from the Departments which have not been furnished and could not be furnished because of the limited time afforded?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. So far as regards myself, I feel I am prepared here to say I want no more witnesses. Bring me no more reports.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. As I know how easy it is to procrastinate by calling witnesses, I would like to know whether they have finished taking the testimony of my friend, Horace Greeley. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The relations of my colleague with that distinguished individual are perhaps more confidential than my own. [Laughter.] I cannot answer the question. Mr. Greeley was not called at my instance.

But I will proceed to add, that so far as the minority of the committee are involved—and I think I may speak for them; they will correct me if I err—they are satisfied with the testimony which is before them. They think there are abundant reasons for the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors before the highest tribunal of the nation. They want no more. They are ready to report now and make the issue before this House and the country, and to ask of this House whether they are right or wrong; and I think it will be found that the differences between the seven members of the committee on this side of the House are not quite so material as may have been generally supposed, but are merely technical, resting upon grounds upon which this House—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to bring into this discussion now the issues that have been pending in the committee. And let me say one thing further to the gentleman. While I will not disclose either now or at any time what has transpired in that committee as to taking testimony, causing witnesses to be subpoenaed, and calling for documents from the Departments, I will say this much, that there is much more of delay in the demand he has made than in any that I have made from the beginning of the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I beg to differ with my learned friend on that question. I think it will be found as I state when the House examines the record that is to be made, and with that I am willing to leave it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No matter which of you it was, we want to cure that.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. What I am saying here does not involve any breach of confidence, any disclosure of any facts that has occurred before the committee. It is the inference which the public is authorized to draw from the resolutions which they have already given to the country, one of which declares the common opinion of seven members of the committee, that the President of the United States is entitled to the severe censure of this House and the condemnation of the people. I take it, then, as an inference from what has been published from the records, if you will allow me to call it so, that there is but one question between us, and that is, whether this condemnation, this sentence of censure, shall be a judicial or an extra-judicial one; whether it shall be a mere declaration of the committee, a mere nullity, without effect, falling still-born from them, or whether it shall result in the exercise of our constitutional powers in the impeachment of the President. I have a right to hold this language.

But I was about to remark when interrupted that in my judgment the committee was right to pass upon this question. When it adjourned in the beginning of the month of June, I think it adjourned with the view of taking no further testimony, holding itself open, as was of course but proper, to receive any that might be offered. It returned here on the 26th of June for the purpose of making up its report. The House had requested that that report should be made on the first day of the session. The committee was not then prepared. The minority are ready now; the majority are not. They want time. Why they want it is not for me to say. They have not stated it. Is it for the purpose of taking further testimony? I think not. I think the chairman of the committee will not say so. If there is anything further to be disclosed it seems to me it will be only cumulative. I do not think there is any new point of inquiry, as I am satisfied there is no one that we have not touched on, which there is not testimony sufficient for those who favor an impeachment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this is a very singular performance on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it seems to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. It has been brought about by a singular performance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. He has informed this House that there is no necessity for the taking of any testimony since the adjournment in June.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of the minority.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The minority certainly, because the gentleman is from the minority and has been making this disclosure to the House. Now, sir, if that be true it is a most remarkable state of affairs that gentlemen having made up their judgment in June, and declaring now that they have wanted no further testimony whatever, have called, with very few exceptions, for all of the testimony that has been taken since that time.

He speaks of our not being ready and wanting more testimony, when the call for testimony in the committee has come from himself and his associates. He has told us here to-day that he wanted no more testimony, although the committee has not yet received from the hands of the reporter testimony taken at his instance to-day.

Sir, I do not think that this disclosure was entirely proper; and when I made the statement which I did in behalf of the committee I did not wish to engage in the discussion of any of these questions, or to disclose anything that occurred in the committee. But I will say here, in behalf of both the majority and the minority of that committee, that they have faithfully and diligently labored upon this case. I do not believe that there is any member of the committee who has not discharged his duty faithfully in regard to this investigation. At the same time we all felt that it involved a question requiring some time for its consideration, not only to take testimony upon it, but to enable the members of the committee to present, clearly and thoroughly, their views to the House. The gentleman may be prepared with a report, but it has never been submitted to the committee.

Now, sir, I do not know what course the House may take. I have stated to the House what the committee directed me to state: that they are not prepared now to submit their report. If the House shall direct that committee to report at once the evidence that they have taken, of course the committee will obey that order. But, sir, for one I may be allowed to say that while I have been examining the testimony taken carefully and diligently I have not yet completed any report conveying my views of the case. If the House are determined that the case shall come before this body and the country without due preparation of course it can order such a report to be made; but I say again that so far as the majority of the committee is concerned their report is but partially completed.

Sir, I will not at this time say anything in regard to my own views or the views of those who concur with me on the committee in regard to this question. I shall express my opinion and the opinion of those who concur with me at some future time; but I do not believe that upon the present uncompleted testimony, with calls for information yet unanswered, it is either proper or just that the House should take the responsibility of requiring a report to be made upon this question now.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Nothing that I have said—

Mr. BOUTWELL. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Not more than four or five minutes. Nothing that I have said, I think, has disclosed anything that took place before the Committee on the Judiciary; and if any such disclosure has been made, I think it is due to my learned and honorable friend rather than to myself.

Mr. PIKE. I rise to a question of order. I submit that upon the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in regard to an adjournment, it is not in order to discuss the doings of the Judiciary Committee upon this question of impeachment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. That is precisely the ground I take.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that proceedings in committee-room cannot, if any gentleman makes the point, be discussed in the House. The Chair will further state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that the hour of three o'clock has arrived, at which time the Pennsylvania delegation gave notice that they would announce the death of their colleague, Mr. DENISON, and unless they yield, this matter must go over until to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. Let it go over.

The SPEAKER. The further consideration of the resolution will then be postponed until to-morrow, when it will come up as a question of privilege immediately after the reading of the Journal.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES DENISON.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, the sad duty has devolved upon me to announce to this House the death of my colleague and friend, our late fellow-member, Hon. CHARLES DENISON, Representative from the twelfth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania. He died at his home in Wilkesbarre during the late recess of Congress, of a pulmonary disease with which he had been long afflicted, and which, during the latter part of his congressional career, compelled his frequent and sometimes protracted absence from his seat in this Hall.

He was born on the 23d day of January, 1818, in the valley of Wyoming, in the State of Pennsylvania, where he resided during the whole of his life, and was chosen by those who knew him longest and best to represent his native district in the Congress of the United States.

He was a man of liberal education, and a graduate of Dickinson College in 1838. He early adopted the profession of the law, which he continuously and successfully practiced until elected to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. He was afterward elected to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and again elected to the present Congress, to represent the same constituency for the third time, which in Pennsylvania is always regarded as an especial mark of distinction.

The infirm health of Mr. DENISON prevented him from taking that active and prominent part in the proceedings of this body which would otherwise have been expected from his strength of character and fine intellectual abilities. The same circumstance prevented in a great degree the cultivation on his part of that general acquaintance among his fellow-members which his excellent social qualities would otherwise have prompted; but he commanded the respect and confidence of all who approached him. He was a man of sound judgment, patriotic impulses, and inflexible purpose. Modest and without ostentation, but full of courage and determination to meet the requirements of every occasion. No possible temptations of personal advantage could swerve him from his convictions of public duty; and he would make no compromise, even indirectly, which had the least appearance of a surrender of principle. Correct in business affairs, kind, steadfast, and true in his domestic and social relations, his private, like his public life, was above reproach. Death to him was neither unexpected nor terrible. It may not be inappropriate in me to relate an incident illustrative of his calm contemplation of its near approach. It is well known to this House that during the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress he was appointed a member of the select Committee of Investigation on the New Orleans Riot. But just as he was about to start upon his intended journey to New Orleans to join his colleagues there, he was suddenly prostrated by illness, and I was appointed to take his place. The evening before my departure from Washington upon that occasion, in a conversation at his room, he informed me without the least emotion, and as if he was conversing upon a matter of ordinary business, that, in his judgment, the termination of his life was not far distant. To my encouraging remarks he simply and calmly replied that it was appointed unto all men once to die, and that it ought not to make much difference to them as respects the exact time when their earthly mission was to be brought to a close. He spoke like one whose peace had been made with God and whose conscience was void of offense toward man. May it be given to all of us so to live that we, too, may thus meet the death which is appointed for all the living.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with emotions of deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES DENISON, a Representative in this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That this House tenders to the wife and family of the deceased its profound sympathy in this our mutual bereavement, and as a testimony of respect for the character and memory of the deceased the members of the House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond in part to the resolutions which have just been offered in respect to the memory of my late colleague, Mr. CHARLES DENISON.

It was my privilege to be his associate in the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth Congresses, and he was also present at the first session of the present Congress in March. An acquaintance and association with him soon ripened into a regard and friendship, for I was not long in finding out his noble traits of character.

As a legislator he was able, intelligent, and pure; as a citizen, of patriotic motives and unyielding and unbending purpose and intent; as a friend he was true; as husband and father he was affectionate and was beloved. In a word he was a good man; so lived, and so died.

In the public councils he commanded unbounded respect, and at his home his three elections to this House indicate in what esteem he was held. His example should not be without its lesson. A public man who can yield this life with such a name to live after him as CHARLES DENISON may indeed be imitated.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, Hon. CHARLES DENISON, to whose memory we are now paying our tribute of respect, was born in Wyoming valley, Pennsylvania, on the 23d of January, 1818, graduated at Dickinson College in 1838, and adopted the profession of law. He was a kind and amiable gentleman, and was honored by an election to the Thirty-Eighth, Thirty-Ninth, and Fortieth Congresses from the twelfth district of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Luzerne and Susquehanna; was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and on Expenditures in the Navy Department. While a member of this House his gentlemanly deportment and urbanity of manners commanded the admiration and respect of his fellow-members. He took an active part in the great issues of the country; though we differed on the political questions of the day, and as to the best mode for the restoration of the late rebellious States, yet all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance will accord to him honesty of purpose and devotion to his country. He was chosen as one of the Representatives of this Republic in an important crisis which called forth the best energies of statesmen. He was not a man of robust constitution, and it was evident during the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that his health was in a decline. He was with us on the 4th of March last, a day that will long be remembered, when the Thirty-Ninth Congress expired and the Fortieth organized, which was an important epoch in the history of our country; he was then in feeble health, so much so that he was unable to leave this city at the adjournment. After some time he started for his home, and on his arrival at Baltimore had a relapse and was detained there some weeks.

I afterward met him in the cars on his way from Baltimore and shook hands with him for the last time. Though weak, he was cheerful, and expressed a lively hope that when he reached his home and had an opportunity of visiting the mountain regions he would in some measure regain his health so as to enable him to resume his seat at the regular session of Congress; but in that he was mistaken, as a beneficent Providence ordered otherwise. His health continued to decline until about the 28th of last month, when he expired with a serene countenance, surrounded by his family and friends, and his spirit ascended to Him who gave it. In the death of our fellow-member the country has lost an able Representative, we a courteous collaborer, and his family an affectionate husband, an indulgent parent. This bereavement is a solemn warning to us, and especially to our delegation, who within a few months have by the cold hands of death been deprived of two of our members. The voice of our departed friend will no longer be heard in this Representative Hall; his seat will be occupied by another. We may look around upon those who now fill these seats and ask ourselves who of us next the cold hand of death will be laid upon. This mystery we cannot solve, it is only known to our Heavenly Father; but we are warned again and again to be ready, as we know not the day or hour that we shall be called to render our final account, as death is no respecter of persons. In a few years all those that now occupy seats here will be numbered with the dead.

Mr. Speaker, I most cheerfully indorse the resolutions now before the House, and say of our departed friend, farewell.

Mr. GETZ. Mr. Speaker, heathen philosophy teaches us to say nothing but good of the dead; Christian philosophy instructs us to speak no evil of any man, living or dead. I think, sir, that disregard of the Christian precept is a more venial offense than a violation of the heathen maxim, for if we assail the living, he is present to confront his accusers and defend himself; if we asperse the dead, he cannot answer. The tongue, however vocal it may have been, is mute; the lips, however eloquent, are sealed in silence that no human power can break. But the friends of the gentleman whose death has been just announced find a sad pleasure in the knowledge that, even if any one had the malignant will to defame his memory, he could find naught to warrant it. His private life was blameless; his public career was beyond reproach.

CHARLES DENISON was a native of the beautiful Pennsylvania valley which has been made classic ground by the immortal verse of one of England's greatest poets. His thoughts and feelings naturally partook of the placid scenes and sweet influences which surrounded his childhood and youth. His manners were gentle, his imagination vivid, and his mind so equally balanced that its serenity was rarely, if ever, disturbed. That he was a man of worth is proved by his election to a seat in this House for three successive terms by a people rigidly jealous of their interests and ever watchful of the speech and acts of their Representatives. His constituency of all parties respected him; those of the party to which he steadfastly adhered confided in and loved him. Could the most partial eulogist say more in his praise?

My acquaintance with the deceased was of very recent date. True, I had known him by reputation long and well. But it was only in the month of March last that the opportunity was offered me of taking him by the hand in personal friendship. Even then the seeds of an incurable disease had taken root in his system. I shall never forget the few words he spoke to me when, upon seeing him in his seat one morning after several days' absence; I approached him with my congratulations upon his apparently improved health. "Sir," said he, with an impressive seriousness, "I am far from well. I have been several times at death's door, and feel that my hold upon life is very frail." Frail, indeed, as a thread of the finest gossamer did it prove itself. To human estimate his life was not complete. He died at the age when man's mental powers and physical strength are yet in full force and vigor. But he had at least finished his course so far as to make a record of personal probity and public honor that will endure so long as his name shall be remembered; and he met death not without forewarning and not unprepared.

"After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

Nothing is more uncertain, nor yet more certain, than death—uncertain as to time; absolutely certain as to the event. A few years more, or a few years less, and all of us shall have followed him to that—

"Undiscovered country, from whose bourn No traveler returns."

What an appalling specter in the pathway of human ambition does not this reflection invoke! Struggle as we may for the wealth, the honors, the fame that this world places within our reach—propose as we will schemes of self-aggrandizement, it is God, and God alone, who disposes. There are neither riches, nor honor, nor power in the grave, whither we are all hastening.

When death comes so near to us we all feel the littleness of even the noblest pursuits of life. And we should feel, too, that time is too precious a boon to be wasted in frivolous controversy; that our powers of mind and thought might be, and should be, devoted to a better purpose than partisan disputes and personal detraction. No man, I care not how callous his heart may have become, how blunted his sensibilities, how seared his conscience, would wish to die with the utterances of envy, hatred, malice, or uncharitableness against even his worst enemy fresh upon his lips. This very hour our souls may be required of us. Let this solemn fact mitigate our partisan asperities, curb our too ready impulses toward political strife and discord, and teach us to cultivate more closely those fraternal relations which are most pleasing in the sight of the Father of us all.

Others who knew Mr. DENISON better than I must pronounce his eulogy. My intention in rising was to pay a mere passing tribute to the memory of a departed colleague. Reverently, then, strewing these few flowers of thought, plucked hastily and at random, upon his new-made grave, I bid him a long and last farewell.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Speaker, brief as was my acquaintance with our lately cherished but now deeply lamented friend and fellow-member, I cannot refrain from offering my testimonial of regard to his many virtues, both as a man and as a citizen. I feel that I should not only do violence to my own emotions, but that I should fail in my duty to the honored memory of the dead, did I not, in this formal way at least, mingle my heartfelt regrets with those of his more immediate colleagues, his surviving fellow-members from Pennsylvania. This manifestation of respect is eminently due to departed worth. Either morally or intellectually CHARLES DENISON was no common man. Every line of his speaking face, every deliberate utterance of his thoughtful mind, stamped him as a man of marked individuality of character. No man of kindred sympathies could be in communion with him and fail to be impressed with the conviction that in him truth, honesty, and integrity found a living and congenial home. I scarcely ever knew a man who grew so rapidly and so favorably in the esteem of those who came in contact with him. Not that he was forward in his habits of forming new associations or making new acquaintances; not from any off-hand readiness of familiarity with strangers, or over-frankness of temperament or character; but from a quiet, though genial, an easy, but sincere and earnest social disposition, which made him at once, and without undue formality, both an agreeable companion and a highly interesting and instructive friend.

In relation to all the duties of life, civil, religious, or political, or in regard to the passions, the prejudices, or the weaknesses of human nature, he was a man of high-toned and liberal views, decided and firm in his political convictions upon all the great and cardinal questions of national policy; rigid and unvacillating in the discharge of his public duties, though always characterized by a never-failing personal courtesy to all those who might differ with him in opinion. He was a partisan only because political truth and political virtue were necessary to insure the public welfare in a constitutional government through party organizations. In him good faith to an obligation, whether public or private, was a principle rather than a sentiment. Duty was his highest motive, an approving conscience his noblest earthly reward. He achieved an honorable success in life simply because as to him, in a moral point of view, there could be success nowhere, except as it lay in the plain path of duty. No personal suffering, no private inconvenience could induce him to forget or forego the thorough discharge of the public duties of his station. Although greatly prostrated by the ravages of the disease which was consuming him, he remained here some two or three weeks after the adjournment of the March session of Congress, giving assiduous and unremitting attention to the business of his constituents.

Pain and suffering and all the anxieties or endearments of home could neither force nor wear him from his labors, or compel or induce him to abandon what he conceived to be his duty to his country and his constituents. Whether right or wrong in his convictions, he died with the harness on his back, almost a martyr to his high-minded sense of duty to his friends. Such a termination of mortal existence, such a close of human life touches the sublime of moral beauty, and should reconcile the querulous, the discontented, and the desponding to a manly appreciation of all the trials and tribulations which belong to a revolution in the social organism, or which pertain to a great crisis in the life of a nation. I shall never forget the deep impression made on my mind by the last interview with our departed friend. The last time I saw him was at the President's Mansion on the eve of my departure for home after the adjournment of the last Congress. In parting with him on that occasion, he sadly remarked to me that in all probability it was the last time we should see each other on earth. Alas, sir, his words were but too prophetic. His manly life was going out, the mysterious cord of his existence was being loosened, the golden bowl was being broken at the fountain on the very day I was passing through his beautiful mountain district, made classic by the genius of Campbell and the name of Wyoming, on my way to the national capital to attend a session of Congress in which his seat was vacant, and from which his spirit had departed forever. In dropping the tear of friendship upon his untimely but honored grave, no extravagance of eulogy, no long-drawn catalogue of his virtues would be appropriate to or in harmony with the modesty and unostentatious nature of his character while living. It is enough to say that in his death we have lost a valuable and truly honorable member of this body, Pennsylvania an upright and useful citizen, and his more immediate constituents an able and faithful representative. Sadly, sir, but with a lively and gratified recollection of the friendship of the departed, I second the resolutions of respect and condolence offered by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. BOYER. As a further tribute to the memory of the deceased, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By the SPEAKER: Petition of T. M. Kappler, of Schwebheim.

By Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of over 4,000 citizens of Maryland, praying that Congress will grant them universal suffrage.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 11, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HOWE. I was not in when the Journal was read yesterday, but during the afternoon I saw by the "Globe" that I was recorded as having voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] the day before yesterday. I intended to obtain the floor during the afternoon yesterday and ask to have the Journal corrected in that respect, if it could be. I did not vote upon that motion at all. If it is not too late I should like to have the Journal corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be corrected, no objection being made, and will be corrected accordingly.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 131, the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 131) to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOWARD, to add to the sixth section the following proviso:

Provided, That the mere act of voting for an ordinance of secession, so called, at a popular election, shall not of itself be deemed under this act engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States; nor shall any person be deemed disqualified for registration under this act merely because of his having held or exercised the functions of a justice of the peace, notary public, trustee, officer, or agent of any institution of learning, commissioner of banks, railroads, and bridges or highways, trustee of churches, religious associations, or schools, minister, priest, or other person vested with authority to solemnize marriage, State commissioner or agent for taking acknowledgments of deeds, conveyances, depositions, or affidavits.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as I announced yesterday, the leading object I had in view in presenting to the consideration of the Senate the amendment which is now before us was to elicit the views of the Senate, so far as possible, touching the true construction and effect to be given to that part of the oath contained in the supplemental act which excludes officers who have taken the oath required by the Constitution from registration, and who have rendered aid and comfort to the rebellion; and I am very happy for one that so much has been said by honorable Senators by way of illustrating that point. There is necessity, I apprehend, that there should be some discussion upon that question here for the enlightenment of the boards of registration throughout the rebel States.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday asked me a question, which was whether the simple act of voting for an ordinance of secession, unattended by any other act promotive of the rebellion tending to give aid and comfort to the rebels, was not an act of treason in itself. As the question was put to me, I felt obliged to answer it in the negative; but there are other considerations necessarily connected with this question. While I admit that the mere voting for an ordinance of secession at a popular election would not in and of itself constitute the crime of treason, still I cannot say that where a war has been organized in a State, and an army is in the field, or a military force is in array in that State, the simple giving of a vote for secession in that State at a popular election would not be a treasonable act. I think the act of thus voting, therefore, must be qualified necessarily by the circumstances of the State, the circumstances under which the vote was given, and the purpose for which it was given. If, for instance, in the State of Virginia, there was at the time of this popular election upon the question of secession in May, 1861, an actual war going on against the authority of the United States; if there were troops marshaled in the field for rebellious and treasonable purposes; and a party should go and vote in favor of secession at such a time and under such circumstances, surely I could not deny that the act of thus voting, tending directly to encourage and give aid to the military movement hostile to the Government, would not be a treasonable act. I am inclined to think it would; and in this connection allow me to read a single passage from the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States on the trial of Bollman to be found in 4 Cranch. The court says:

"It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime (treason) who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors. But there must be an actual assembling of men for the treasonable purpose to constitute a levying of war."

Under such a state of circumstances as I have suggested, it seems to me that the voting for an ordinance of secession would be a very direct act rendering aid, comfort, and encouragement to the enemy. Again, sir, there are several cases where there was no popular election held upon the question of secession; there are other cases where within the limits of the State at the time the ordinance of secession was voted upon there was no war against the United States; and this diversity of circumstances of course must exist throughout the entire rebel States, throughout the entire community. I do not, therefore, see how the principle suggested in the amendment which I have offered can be safely applied as a general rule throughout the rebel States; and as the bill now before us, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, contemplates giving the respective boards of registration a pretty large share of judicial authority, authority to decide just such questions as this will be, I am inclined to think that the safer course, after all, will be to leave this and various other questions which must arise to be decided by them as they shall respectively arise from time to time, and before I sit down I shall ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

But, while I am up, I desire to say a word or two in response to my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL], the head of the Judiciary Committee. Yesterday, during the course of the discussion, he remarked in reference to myself, and I thought in rather a tone of complaint, that it was in consequence of the long oath which had found its way into the supplemental bill upon my motion that the Attorney General of the United States had held that the oath itself was conclusive evidence of the qualification of the voters. I was very sorry to hear this imputation from so respectable and so respected a source, and I really could not understand it. I should be very sorry indeed, and I dare say not more so than the honorable Senator from Illinois would be, that I should be held responsible for the opinions of the Attorney General. But in point of fact, on looking at the various bills that were before the Senate there is no foundation, no shadow of foundation, for any such complaint or imputation against me. How stood the facts at that time? The honorable Senator, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the supplemental bill passed by the House was referred by this body, reported it back to this body with an amendment, which he asked to have printed as a substitute for the whole bill from the House. In this substitute, drawn, I apprehend, by the honorable Senator's own pen, he uses this language:

"That before the first day of September, 1867, the commanding officer in each district"—

defined by the original act passed March 2, 1867—

"shall cause a registration to be made of all male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward resident in each county or parish in the State or States in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid; and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation."

Then follows the oath suggested by the honorable Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A short oath.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a comparatively short oath; but I take it the brevity or the length of the oath can have no sort of influence upon the question of the construction to be given to the body of the act. This oath, like the long oath of which he complains, gives to the board of registration no sort of power whatever. There is not one word in either oath conferring authority upon the board of registration. In a word—

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Michigan will allow me; the difference is this: the oath as reported originally did not undertake to specify all the qualifications necessary for registration and voting. I do not think the oath as the Senator from Michigan finally amended it undertook to do it, for I have shown that it left out some things; but the Attorney General has undertaken to construe the oath as we finally adopted it as having incorporated into itself everything requisite to authorize a person to be registered and to vote.

Mr. HOWARD. And in that particular respect I think the Attorney General is correct.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has not embodied everything in it.

Mr. HOWARD. It was the object to embody in the oath all the qualifications necessary for the party offering himself for registration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not to exclude other testimony?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly not to exclude other testimony; but the oath itself left the powers of the board of registration precisely in the same condition in which the honorable Senator from Illinois in his substitute left them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I think.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly that can be the only conclusion. Then why does my friend from Illinois undertake to charge me with furnishing ground to the Attorney General for holding that this oath is conclusive evidence of the qualification of voters? I really think, indeed I know, that the honorable Senator would not do me wrong in that respect; and I regard his observation rather in the nature of a pleasantry than otherwise, and am willing therefore to let it pass. Such, however, are the facts. The oath gives the board no sort of authority, whether it be the short oath of the gentleman from Illinois or the long oath of the gentleman from Michigan. That is the real truth of the case. But it does not follow from that that the board had no authority to pass upon the qualifications of applicants. I think they had some authority. I cannot doubt it, Mr. President. The body of the act itself, as reported by the honorable Senator from Illinois, and as finally passed by the two Houses, declares that the class offering themselves for registration shall include "only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid;" that is, by the act of the 2d of March, 1867, and "who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation."

I believe the board of registration have some authority under this old act to interrogate an applicant and to listen to some proof respecting his qualifications. They certainly have the same power that every court of justice possesses of guarding against a fraud upon the law. For instance, if Jefferson Davis or any of the leading traitors who were notoriously such, whose hands were stained with the blood of our countrymen from the commencement of the war, should offer themselves to register before one of these boards, according to the opinion of the Attorney General it would be the duty of the board, if the applicant was base and false enough to take the oath, to admit him to registration; and even Jefferson Davis or any other arrant, notorious rebel, according to that ruling, would have the right to registration. This is the conclusion of the Attorney General. He strips the board of all possible judicial authority, and makes it more impotent in respect to frauds upon the law itself than an ordinary court of justice is. In that respect I must say that I think the Attorney General's opinion is very faulty, to use no severer term; and I feel a deep regret that there is a necessity that Congress should get together here to correct a construction, which, according to my judgment, is so manifestly, not to say so flagrantly, erroneous. I now ask leave of the Senate to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan one question before he sits down. Take the case of the State of Tennessee, where men voted for secession after the war had commenced and had been carried on for some time, after there had been some acts of hostility in the State and troops raised on both sides. I should like to know whether he regards voting for an act of secession under those circumstances as an act of treason or not?

Mr. HOWARD. I am inclined to think that I would regard such an act as treason. It is certainly evidence that would be competent to go to the jury on a charge of treason against the particular person voting. It would tend to show the animus, the guilty purpose, which the voter had in view to promote the existing rebellion, the existing war; and it could, I think, receive no other construction at the hands of the jury or the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan is withdrawn.

Mr. HOWE. I move the following amendment to the fourth section, to be added to the section as a proviso:

Provided, That any person heretofore appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army the same as if such appointment had not been confirmed by this act.

I believe there is no objection to that amendment. I do not know for a certainty that it affects the true interpretation of the section, and yet I think it removes a doubt which might arise. The second and third sections authorize these generals to remove officers claiming under the local authority, and to appoint others in their places. I fear, without the addition of that proviso, it will be held that any officer who has already been appointed, inasmuch as he is not one claiming under the local authority, but claiming under the national authority, cannot be removed, although the generals may be satisfied they have made a mistake; and to remove that doubt I have offered this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think myself there is any necessity for this amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I think the legal effect of the bill as it is the same; but he seems to think that there may be a doubt about the construction of it. I do not know that the amendment will do any harm, as it is merely to carry out what I understand to be the bill as it is; and therefore I have no serious objection to urge to it except that by inserting these amendments in the haste of business in the Senate, without having time properly to consider them, we may incorporate into the bill unintentionally something that we do not wish to have there. I think the bill is sufficient as it is in this respect, and I think it means precisely what the Senator from Wisconsin desires to accomplish. I design it should mean that; but as there is some difference of opinion in regard to it I have no objections to urge against the amendment if the Senate think proper to adopt it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of my friend from Wisconsin whether he intends these district commanders to have the power in the future to change and turn out any civil appointee they may make themselves hereafter?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand him to say that he does. I am very much of opinion on reading his amendment that the effect of adopting it will be absolutely to prevent that. The construction of the bill as it now stands is clear, in my opinion, to the point that this power of substitution exists; but since the bill was reported my friend will remember that we have voted into it the amendment of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] giving the power to appoint civil persons to fill the offices that may hereafter be vacated. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as I read it at the desk hastily, seems to apply only to this confirmatory section, and to expressly limit it to persons who have been heretofore appointed by the military commanders from civil life, and whose appointment is by this section confirmed. Therefore it appears to me that if we adopt the amendment in the way it now stands we shall cut off the right of the commanders to make any future change of any person whom they may hereafter appoint. I make the suggestion, and I think my friend will see the force of it on looking at his amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think that objection is well taken. The amendment, if I have not forgotten it, does not limit its operation in terms to appointments heretofore made. It is only because it is an amendment to the fourth section, which provides only for the case of appointments heretofore made, that it can have that construction. But now the difficulty that I fear is this: already certain officers have been removed and civilians have been appointed in their place; and in reference to those appointments, and in reference to those appointments alone, as I understand, the fourth section speaks; and what does it say? Simply that those appointments shall be confirmed. What is that? That the men so appointed to be officers shall be the officers; and I fear, Congress having said that with reference to those appointments and those alone, that the commanding officer or the general would say, "Congress having confirmed these individuals in office I have no longer any authority over them." I meant to make the proviso only so broad as the section is, and I certainly think it is not any broader. With reference to other appointments that may be made hereafter under the amendment adopted yesterday there is no express confirmation of them in office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment may be again repeated.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Provided, That any person heretofore appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army, the same as if such appointment had not been confirmed by this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will see that the proviso is expressly limited to appointments from civil life heretofore made, and hence any astute law officer of the Government who wishes to put that construction upon it can say that here is an unlimited proviso as to the power of removal of a certain class of persons, but they must have been appointed "heretofore;" and inasmuch as another part of the act gives the power of appointment hereafter, but does not contain any such proviso, therefore the construction of the whole act, taken together, must be that this power of removal is only of those persons who have already been appointed. I do not say that that will certainly be the true construction; I say it will be very easy for any law officer who wishes to come to that result to come to it without any particular violation of the statute.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Vermont will suggest what correction there would avoid all possibility here of the interpretation he suggests I would like to have him do so. The fact is, I understand, that some appointments have been made which the generals themselves regret, and they do not want to be foreclosed against the right to change the selections when they have ascertained the proper persons to put in their place; and it is that point that I make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest to my friend to modify his amendment so as to insert after the word "heretofore" the words "or hereafter;" so as to read:

Provided, That any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander, &c.

Mr. HOWE. I will accept that suggestion with a further modification, striking out all words after "Army."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified by the mover will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I offer an amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That no constitution adopted by any of said rebel States shall entitle such State to representation in the Congress of the United States unless it declare that such State shall ever remain a member of the American Union; that every citizen of such State owes paramount allegiance to the United States, and that no law or ordinance of such State in subversion or contravention of the authority of the United States can have any binding force.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise the question of order upon that amendment, that it is not in order for the reason that we are acting under a rule of the Senate which declares that nothing is in order except a bill to carry out the reconstruction acts according to their original scope and intention, and there is nothing of this kind in the original acts. This would open the whole subject to a new reconstruction act. If we go into that field we may change the whole thing. I submit to my friend from Missouri, with that understanding, whether he had best not withdraw this amendment, and not undertake to get up a new reconstruction act, or rather to adopt a feature that is not in harmony with the reconstruction acts which we had agreed upon. They were working very well. We all thought they would accomplish the object if they had been carried out in the spirit with which they were passed. Now this is a new proposition, entirely variant from anything that is in those bills, and I submit it is not in order.

Mr. DRAKE. I regret very much that the honorable Senator from Illinois should endeavor to exclude from the bill which we have now before us and from the reconstruction policy of the Government a provision so manifestly proper and necessary as this, and to exclude it upon a point of order. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests that the point of order is to be decided without debate. Is he right in that suggestion, sir?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, in the first instance. By an appeal you can draw it into debate if you do not like the decision.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator from Illinois was allowed to debate his side of the point of order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated the point, and then I did make an appeal to my friend from Missouri to see if he would not withdraw the amendment. I am aware that it is not allowable to debate the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. You may make a statement in regard to it, but not enter into an argument about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was the duty of the Senator from Illinois to state his point clearly, so that it would be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I prefer not to be called on to decide these questions arising in this way. They are difficult points. What reconstruction is and the scope and extent of it is pretty difficult to determine. It has a great many branches to it, and a great many things might be deemed to come within the range of reconstruction. The resolution of the Senate is to the effect that no legislation shall be had upon any other subject than that of reconstruction, or that it would be inexpedient to proceed to anything else at this session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another clause to the rule, if the Chair will allow me—

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the rule read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the rule be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of July 5, as follows:

Resolved, That the legislative business of this session be confined to removing the obstructions which may have been or are likely to be placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress, and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed; and that further legislation at this session on the subject of reconstruction or on any other subject is not expedient.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My precise point, if the Chair will allow me, is that legislation must be confined to removing obstacles in the way of the fair execution of the acts we have already passed, and that a proposition involving a new plan of reconstruction, different from what already exists, is not in order under that rule. This has no relation, as I insist, to carrying out the acts of reconstruction. That is the point.

Mr. DRAKE. The point that I make is that this is in no sense whatever introducing a new plan of reconstruction: it is simply requiring those rebel States, when they do become reconstructed, to lay the foundation of their State governments upon those eternal principles connected with our Government for which we fought the war of the rebellion and put them down.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was your suggestion in the original bill?

Mr. DRAKE. It was not in the original bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I insist it is not in order.

Mr. DRAKE. Then I insist that if it is not in order this Senate shall declare it in order by an affirmative vote. Do not let us throw away all we have been fighting for for years and leave the miserable fooleries and hideous monstrosities of State rights down there in the South to be brought up against us continually again.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This question is not debatable.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make a suggestion in connection with this point; I do not intend to speak to the merits of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the suggestion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand the resolution is that legislation is in order which is to execute the former law and to remove the obstacles that may have been interposed already or may be interposed hereafter to carrying into complete effect the original scope and intention of the reconstruction acts. Described in general language, that is the rule of order. It is not confined to past obstructions, but extends to future ones. Now, sir, in the reconstruction acts it is provided that these constitutions shall be submitted to Congress, and that the approval of Congress shall be deliberately given to them before reconstruction shall take effect. Under that clause or section of the reconstruction laws I think an amendment announcing to those people the conditions in those constitutions which Congress will require for their approval is giving a necessary and proper notice to the inhabitants in framing their fundamental law, and is in due execution of the general scope and purpose of our whole legislation on this subject. I say this as to the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order cannot be debated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am against the amendment when we reach it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Important as I deem the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and I think for myself hardly any proposition is more important, still

I cannot see that it is fairly within the resolution we have already passed. It introduces a new subject. It may be that these States are required to submit their constitutions when they are altered to the inspection of Congress, and perhaps the revision of Congress; but it seems to me that this provision is foreign to the business of reconstruction as set forth in the several acts on that subject. I do not see that those acts touch this point at all. It strikes me, therefore, that the amendment is out of order as being entirely irrelevant, or rather as introducing a new subject not connected with those acts of reconstruction referred to in the resolution under which we have agreed to act. I must therefore declare it out of order.

Mr. DRAKE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that point I desire to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. DRAKE. In the reconstruction acts which we have heretofore passed there are several conditions laid down which must be fulfilled before those States can be entitled to representation on the floor of Congress, and among others is this condition:

"And if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

Now, sir, in the formation of these constitutions the ultimate object to be obtained by any of those States is the approval of Congress; and, in my opinion, it is perfectly competent, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that we should give notice beforehand to the people of those States as to the fundamental principles upon which their constitutions shall be based. We are not excluded, in my opinion, by the terms of the resolution of the 5th of July from the consideration of this amendment. The resolution declares that "the legislative business of this session be confined to removing the obstructions which have been, or are likely to be, placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress." Now, sir, the fair execution of those acts is not complete until the constitutions are presented here for the approval of Congress, and have received the approval of Congress; and therefore it is that I consider this subject not excluded, for the reason that this very proposition is intended to remove obstructions which are likely to take place in the formation of these constitutions, so that the constitutions when they are formed may not be, in point of fact, unless those obstructions are removed, such as will meet the approval of Congress.

But, sir, the further limitation is put by the resolution of the 5th instant, that the business of the session shall be confined to "giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed." Now, sir, I venture to say that it was the intention of every member of the Senate, when these acts were passed, that the constitutions of the rebel States should be presented here, which do, either in express terms or by necessary implications, affirm the very principles that are laid down in the amendment I have presented. Is it to be supposed for a moment that this Congress would admit back into the Union any of those States if its constitution denied or questioned the principles that are here stated? If it would not, then we are by the pending amendment clearly giving the acts we have passed the scope intended by Congress. If, then, it was the intention of Congress that those constitutions should in themselves directly or by necessary implication affirm these principles, then I say that this amendment is clearly not within the prohibition of the resolution of the 5th of July. It is not affected by it. It is not, therefore, in my judgment, out of order.

And now, sir, I submit to the Senate before the whole country, whether it is wise, whether it is expedient, whether it is just to the country to reject an amendment of this kind, which, if adopted, will compel those States to shatter in pieces and bury out of sight forever the very gods they went into rebellion to serve.

We are dealing with a people among whom for thirty years State rights heresies were promulgated, and which finally brought forth their legitimate fruit in rebellion and war. Now, sir, where was there ever before a power on this earth that subdued a rebellion that did not require from the conquered rebels a renunciation of the errors and wrongs which had led to the rebellion? We can make no treaty of peace with these people, but we can compel them to reject, and renounce, and put out of sight forever the principles and dogmas which led to the rebellion, and which have cost this country such a terrible sacrifice to overthrow. In my opinion we are unfaithful to ourselves if we lose this opportunity of compelling the ten rebel States to renounce and forever abjure those errors. How can we answer to the country—each one to his constituency—for refusing the opportunity, and upon a mere point of order refusing it, to compel that renunciation by that people?

Sir, they have not renounced their State rights heresies. Only this very morning was published in one of the papers of this city a letter from one of the leading rebels of Georgia, in which he announces his fraternity with every and any man who will stand by the first Kentucky resolution of 1798. Sir, do you suppose that when the rebellion was buried, the resolutions of Virginia and Kentucky of 1798 and 1799 were buried too? Very far from it. If they were not buried, you leave above ground here the signal still flying over those rebel States, gathering around it in all future time all those in those States who, though conquered and whipped, still bow down to their idol of State rights.

Sir, I appeal to the Senate, and if they decide against me, I appeal from the Senate to the country. I demand that this nation shall not lose the opportunity now of destroying and putting out of sight forever those heresies which have cost it hundreds of thousands of lives and countless millions of money to put down. And, sir, least of all can I tolerate the thought—and in saying it I mean no disrespect to any Senator—that such an opportunity as this of destroying fundamental errors in government, of breking to pieces the images which these people have been accustomed to worship, shall be lost merely because it is out of order; out of order to sweep from off the surface of ten States false principles of government, heresies which go to the very heart of the Government and to the very foundations of our institutions; out of order to insist upon it that a rebellious people before they come back into the enjoyment of equality shall utterly renounce the fundamental principles of their rebellion. Sir, I trust that no such point of order will ever be allowed in the Senate of the United States to deprive this country of such a golden opportunity of achieving so high a result.

Mr. POMEROY. If we were not called upon to vote on this question I should not say anything about it. The Senator from Missouri knows very well that I would be glad to vote for his amendment, and I would have been glad to have that provision in the original bill; but I do not see how any of us can vote for it here under the rule we have adopted. The proper manner of proceeding, in my opinion, would be to suspend the rule and then let him introduce the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I will move that if the Senate decide against me on the point of order.

Mr. POMEROY. I should feel embarrassed if it were understood that I was opposed to the Senator's amendment, although I must vote that it is not admissible under the rule. The Senate will remember that my objection to the rule itself was that by it we were prohibited from examining the reconstruction acts except in the prescribed form; we cannot put in any matter pertaining to reconstruction that was not in the original laws. That was my objection to the resolution; but the resolution is now a rule, and I propose to live up to it and vote according to its true construction; but if the Senate will suspend the rule, I will then vote with pleasure for the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. DRAKE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that question debatable?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is debatable on the appeal.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to say one word upon it. I will not enter into any consideration of the great question which has been presented so distinctly and ably by my friend from Missouri, except to express my surprise that there can be any rule in the Senate of the United States to interfere with the consideration of such a proposition. It is surprising; it is astonishing. Those who come after us hereafter, when they read of it, will be more surprised and more astonished than any of us now. But I wish to confine myself to the question of order; that is, whether under the existing rule the proposition of the Senator from Missouri can be considered. On that I am obliged most respectfully to differ from the Chair. It seems to me clearly it can be considered. I have in my hands a copy of the supplementary act to which the bill under consideration is an amendment or a further supplement. In that it is provided as follows:

"If the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation."

There is a condition, "and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress." By this very act we have reserved to ourselves plenary power over any constitution that shall be brought before us; and I may say that I have heard an eminent Senator say in conversation that he reserved to himself hereafter the full privilege of voting against any constitution that might be brought before us if it did not contain all those matters which he thought such a constitution ought to contain; and the Senator to whom I refer was one who does not usually act with me. He was against requiring any conditions; he wished to keep it all open; so that hereafter he could say to any State that came with its constitution, "You have not this provision or that provision which I think ought to be in the constitution; therefore I vote against you." Well, sir, the Senator would be right under this bill, for you have expressly reserved to him that power; that is, he may sit in judgment on the constitution, and if he finds it in any respect a failure, or if in any of its provisions it is inadequate, he may reject it; not merely if it does not contain the positive requirements of the bill, but if it does not contain any requirements which his judgment at that time shall think proper.

I have heard a Senator, for instance, say that he was disposed on such an occasion to require a provision for education in the constitutions, even though we do not in so many words formally require it in our act. Now, sir, such things have been said, and may be justly said, for no person can question that any Senator, in making such statements, was acting properly; he was perfectly entitled to do so; and if he should refuse to vote for such a constitution hereafter nobody could criticise him—certainly I could not; but in view of such a possibility, it seems to me clear that we ought to go forward and in advance tell these people at the South what we expect of them and what we do not. We ought not to wrap the question up in generalities and say that hereafter the constitution which they present shall be subject to the approval of Congress, leaving it open for any person at that time to raise any new question then at the eleventh hour when you have now the opportunity of telling them in advance what you require of them. For one, I insist, with the Senator from Missouri, that the new constitutions shall come with ample provisions for the unity of this Republic. That is fundamental; and if a constitution does not contain such a provision for one I am against accepting it. I shall stand then on the text of this law, which gives me this privilege, and say to them, "You have not done your duty in framing your constitution." Still further, if they do not require education in their constitutions, how can I, who believe that education is essential to republican government, recognize one of those constitutions as truly republican in character?

Sir, let us be frank with these people; I should say be generous to them; and now let me tell you, sir, the best generosity is in truth; it is in telling them precisely what you expect of them; and therefore the Senator from Missouri is right when he asks you to announce to these people in advance what we shall expect in their constitutions, the most explicit declarations of adherence to the Union.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that there seems to be a want of good faith on the part of Congress in making provisions for the return of these States in detail, and then when they have complied with those terms and conditions to require something else. For my part, if there is any one thing I prize above another it is in keeping my faith, my pledge, my word, my covenant. This legislation of Congress is a covenant with the South; and when they shall have complied with all that we have required of them and send men here who can take the oath, and do everything we have prescribed to them, they shall be admitted; and to insinuate that we have a right after they have done that to put in other conditions and make other requirements is a lack of faith.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend forgets that the statute positively declares, "and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress," leaving the whole constitution open hereafter to future criticism.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that approval to be to say whether it comes up to our legislation, whether they have complied with what we required; not only whether the constitution is republican in form, but whether it allows equal and exact justice, civil and political rights to be meted out to all the inhabitants of the State. But to say that we may reserve something here and require it after they come is bad faith toward these people. If I had anything to require of them as an absolute condition of their admission I would put it into the bill before asking them to act upon it. For one, I do not believe we have the right to prescribe new terms and new conditions after they have complied with everything contained in our law.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have not been looking at the Constitution recently; but just now I picked it up and find there a provision of this sort:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

I should like to ask my colleague if his amendment will be any stronger in terms than the present provision of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. DRAKE. I will answer my colleague with a great deal of pleasure that that provision was in the Constitution in the days when nullification arose and in the days when the rebellion broke out. The South defied the very Constitution which contained that provision, and went to war to overthrow it. Now, sir, I want to compel them to renounce the doctrines which led them to make war to abjure that very provision in the Constitution along with all the rest.

Mr. HENDERSON. An act of secession never was legal; it was simply an act of revolution. My colleague and myself took that ground. I supposed that everybody who took a position in favor of the Union at all held that an act of secession was not a legal act, was a mere act of revolution against all law; and if this provision of the Constitution be repealed, I suppose that men who are determined upon the commission of rebellion, treason against the Government, will yet forfeit their words and commit it. It is utterly impossible for us to provide against the commission of crime, and it is utterly impossible for us to prevent people by the passage of amendments to the Constitution, either Federal or State, from the commission of treason against the United States.

Mr. DRAKE. And yet I would suggest to my colleague in that connection that when in every one of their constitutions which the people themselves have adopted this declaration contemplated in my amendment is incorporated there is the renunciation staring them in the face in their own constitutions adopted by their own votes. Whenever any man attempts to teach the doctrine of State rights there in order to excite insurrection or rebellion against the General Government or disaffection to it, or to break the allegiance of that people, there stands their voluntary declaration recorded in their constitution; and why should it not be put there? Why should they not be compelled at this moment of time, in order to regain their position in the Union, utterly and forever to renounce the heresies which led them into rebellion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire what the question before the Senate is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair ruling the amendment of the Senator from Missouri out of order stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish we may have a vote upon that question.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TIPTON, (when his name was called.) I wish to state to the Senate that I vote to sustain the decision of the Chair, and yet I do it under protest. I am very sorry to do it. I believe there is necessity for that ruling as long as the resolution exists. How soon the resolution may be rescinded I do not know.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Nye, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sanbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, and Williams—16.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to move to suspend the rule of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not in order.

Mr. SUMNER. We can take up my resolution to rescind the rule; that is on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be taken up while this bill is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yesterday, when this bill was under consideration, I waived my privilege of offering an amendment, which had been submitted to the Senate previously and which had been printed. I did it with the idea of facilitating business, allowing the bill reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, and having it placed upon its third reading, so that it would be at its final stage of amendment. I did not desire at that time to interpose with my amendment or to elicit debate upon it; but from what experience I have since had it appears to me that if I am to have any hearing upon that proposition it must be at this stage. I am not disposed to protract the proceedings of the Senate upon this bill, or upon the business of the session generally, if there be indeed any other business besides this bill for our action; but I am extremely anxious to occupy a short period of time in stating to the Senate and to the people of the country certain facts and views regarding a most important subject which is directly connected with this very question of reconstruction, and in my opinion is necessary to the execution of that system which was established by our former laws. I will move my amendment at this time, and I desire to be heard very briefly by the Senate upon it. I shall not protract the proceedings of the Senate either by my own amendment or by cooperating with others in amendments which they may propose. I ask that my amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That in the election of Representatives in Congress from the said States mentioned in the act of March 2, 1867, each elector shall be entitled to give as many votes as there are Representatives assigned to his State by apportionment of law, and he may give one vote to each of the requisite number of persons to be chosen, or may cumulate his votes and bestow them at his discretion upon one or more candidates less in number than the whole number of Representatives to be chosen from such State.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. Permit me a moment. The Senate will perceive by the reading of the amendment which has been proposed by me that it does not state a new condition of reconstruction, nor extend any condition formerly established by the Congress of the United States. It leaves entirely untouched all those conditions upon which it was proposed that those States should be readmitted into Congress. It submits nothing for the action, for the adoption, or the consent of the people of the southern country. My amendment proposes a distinct exercise of the power of the Congress of the United States without soliciting or proposing any action whatever by the people of the South or by the States in that section of the Union.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to inquire if that is not another subject of legislation? Our legislation is to be confined to this reconstruction matter under our rule, and to carrying out the bills already passed. Now, does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean to be understood as saying that his proposition is in aid of the reconstruction laws already passed, or calculated to remove any obstruction that has been put in their way?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot see how. It seems to me to be clearly out of order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator had waited a few moments, I was coming to that branch of my statement in regard to the amendment. I say, then, in the first place, it is not a condition of reconstruction, and it asks no action of the southern States whatever. The next point is that it is an exercise of clear constitutional power by the Congress of the United States, because we have power to regulate the manner in which representatives from the several States shall be chosen. That is a power which we have exercised heretofore, and there is an existing law upon the statute-book by which it is provided that each State shall be divided into congressional districts, and members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen by the respective districts, and not as formerly by general ticket. I say, then, in the next place, that this is an exercise of constitutional power by the Congress of the United States, if we choose to exercise it, because we have complete jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

It remains, then, for me to call attention to the fact that this exercise of power by us is a necessary and proper exercise of power in connection with the reconstruction of the southern country and the renewed representation of those States; and that without it that reconstruction and that representation cannot be made wisely, cannot be made efficiently, cannot be made so as to execute the paramount and leading design upon which the acts of March last were enacted by Congress. That I propose to show, and it is the main argument, or one of the main arguments, by which I propose to sustain this amendment and convince the members of the Senate, if I do convince any one, that it ought to be adopted by them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It clearly seems to me that this is not in order, and I rise to that question. I submit to the Chair that, admitting everything the Senator says, that his proposition is a wise one, that it is a constitutional one, that Congress would have the power to adopt such a provision as the one proposed, and that it would be a proper provision to adopt now in regard to reconstruction—suppose all that were admitted, and what was proposed by the Senator from Missouri were admitted, to be a very proper thing to be done; yet unless it comes within our rule it cannot be offered at this time. Our rule confines us to removing out of the way the obstacles which have been or may be placed in the way of the execution of certain acts we have passed called the reconstruction laws. Now, I insist that the Senator's proposition is an entirely new proposition and therefore not in order.

Mr. POMEROY. I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Illinois is undertaking to debate his point of order. I think the point of order is well taken, but it cannot be debated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order must be decided without debate. It is exceedingly difficult to decide a question under this resolution, it is so wide and extended. It imposes upon the Chair the duty of recollecting all the laws and all the provisions of law in regard to reconstruction which have been passed, and to form a judgment as to what would tend to obstruct them. That is a judgment which I can hardly pretend to have myself. I think such questions ought to be decided by the Senate. In order to decide them myself, I must assume to know all the provisions of these laws, and also what would tend to their obstruction. One man may be very apt to judge that one thing would obstruct and another man another thing. It hardly seemed to be a proper subject to predicate a question of order upon; and still there is a rule of the Senate on this subject, and the Chair must enforce it when a question is made. But the thing is so wide, it is so difficult to comprehend the extent of all the provisions of the reconstruction laws, and especially everything that might tend to their obstruction, that I prefer to refer this question to the Senate for decision. Under the rules the Chair has the right to do that; and I think these questions are proper for the decision of the Senate, who have made the rule and ought to understand it much better than I, who was opposed to it. The question then will be for the Senate to decide, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania in order under the late rule of the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. Is that question debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is debatable on appeal.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not an appeal; but there is an original question under the rules of the Senate that the Chair propounds to the Senate to decide. I suppose it is debatable.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that questions of order are to be decided without debate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. When decided by the Chair.

Mr. POMEROY. Not simply when decided by the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Any question that goes to the Senate may be debated.

Mr. POMEROY. I think if the Senate are to decide the question as a question of order it is to be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the sixth rule read.

The Chief Clerk read the sixth rule, as follows:

"6. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rule of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any member may, call to order; and when a member shall be called to order by the President or a Senator he shall sit down, and shall not proceed without leave of the Senate. And every question of order shall be decided by the President, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order."

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have two suggestions to make in this connection, if the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Illinois will permit me to get through the matter which I was about stating to the Senate on this question of order.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will understand that there is no Senator more gratified in hearing him than I am. I only want the rules of the Senate enforced.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have two suggestions to make at this point.

Mr. TIPTON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair is this: that when the question is propounded for decision to the Senate themselves it may be debated by them. That is the understanding I have of the rules. I know in other cases, when the question is submitted to the Chair, it must be decided in the first instance without debate; but when it goes to the Senate on appeal it is debatable, and I suppose when referred by the Chair in the first instance to the decision of the Senate it is debatable.

Mr. POMEROY. The Chair will bear in mind that this does not go to the Senate on appeal.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have to state, then, Mr. President, in the first place, that it is very likely that time would be economized by permitting me to proceed with the very brief remarks I desire to submit upon this amendment. We are likely to consume as much of time in debating and determining this question of order as would have been consumed if I had been permitted to proceed with the brief and modest argument which I proposed to make.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion to him? As I understand the rules, it would be perfectly in order for him to make his remarks or his speech on the bill. Whether he can move his amendment, since the rule of last Friday, is another question; but of course the Senator cannot be cut off from making his speech on the bill, because that raises of course every question of policy in connection with representation or government.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, by the reconstruction act of March 2, last, and by the supplemental enactment, a new, unprecedented, and magnificent scheme under the auspices of the Government of the United States was attempted in ten States which were formerly in this Union, if they are not now. It was to take four million population, heretofore held as serfs and bondmen from the first settlement of this country, and endow them with the right of suffrage; and the leading object of those laws, both of the original act and of the supplement, was to introduce into our political system a new element of enormous magnitude, and to give a new action and a new direction to our political institutions. Now, sir, we are engaged in considering business under a rule of order which says that legislation in furtherance of those former laws, that legislation which shall remove obstructions to their complete operation and to their perfect success, shall be in order, and that the Senate shall confine itself to such measures, and shall neglect all others. Now I propose by enactment of the Congress of the United States, under a clear power which we possess, to say that votes in the southern country, as between those formerly qualified and this new class which is now qualified by act of Congress shall be taken in such manner that there shall be no collision between the two classes of voters, that the system introduced by these former laws shall be made satisfactory, and that we shall get fair and just representation under them in the House of Representatives at the first and at all future elections which may take place in those States.

It is somewhat inconvenient to be obliged to treat this great subject; this argument which I have stated in this preliminary and irregular manner, upon a question of order. It hampers and confines one in that freedom of debate which the subject demands. All that I think it necessary to add upon the point of order is this: the Senate, in determining the point of order, are not to determine (for that would be absurd) that the particular proposition will be in furtherance of the reconstruction laws of March last, and the Senate are not to determine that by the amendment existing or future obstructions will be removed, because that is to decide the merit of the proposition as a question of order. I insist that all that we are to determine is that reasonably considered the amendment may have such effect, and may therefore come within the rule. It must be a palpable violation of the rule, it must be a palpable want of furtherance of the policy of reconstruction, it must be a palpable absence of capacity to remove obstructions to it, which will induce the Senate, on a preliminary question of this kind, to rule the amendment out of order, because without debate on that question of order you are to determine the merit of the proposition.

Now, what I have to say is that your enfranchised voters in the southern country, in every State where they do not possess an absolute majority, cannot exercise the rights and privileges which were conferred by the reconstruction laws to any useful and complete purpose at all without this amendment; and in other States, or in any particular locality where by chance this new element of electoral population may have a majority, your system will be made odious without an amendment of this kind.

Why, sir, what are these reconstruction laws concerned about? As they eventually took form, the military government established in the southern country is temporary; it is intended to be provisional; it is to come to an end within a brief period; and the leading object of the laws was to bring electoral power into action in that southern country and to direct that electoral power in the reorganization of governments which we were to recognize as loyal and valid under the Constitution of the United States, entitling the people of those States to Senators and Representatives in Congress. Everything else in those laws, except this vital element of suffrage, was secondary and subordinate and inferior and temporary. And yet, sir, because I propose a fundamental provision relating to that vital point of reconstruction, the manner in which suffrage shall be exercised in electing representatives to the Congress of the United States, I am to be met by a short point of order and told that it does not relate to reconstruction, to carrying out the former laws, that it removes no obstruction in the path of reconstruction which has been developed hitherto or may be developed hereafter. Why, sir, it is begging the whole debate upon my proposition, it is anticipating what will be the judgment of the Senate when it comes to be debated, and therefore it must be a false and unsound objection.

This amendment is a very different one from that proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I thought that was in order; that was my individual opinion; but that proposed a formal compact between these States and the Government of the United States with reference to matters and things in the far distant future; that added a new condition of reconstruction to the enactments of last winter; and from that point of view gentlemen might give such construction to the rule as would exclude it. But here I propose that this very right of suffrage lodged in the black men of the South by your reconstruction laws shall be exercised in such manner that no difficulty and dissatisfaction and failure shall attend it. I am not proposing a new condition for the people of the southern country to assent to. I am not proposing a compact with any southern State. I am simply proposing that by an exercise of the clear power which you possess you shall remove those obstacles and obstructions which attend upon your introduction of colored suffrage in the southern country. I propose that you provide that that suffrage shall be given in a fair, honorable, reasonable, popular manner, so that public opinion shall not be outraged and the proceeding upon which you have entered shall not be interrupted and made odious in in the country,

My own object is, or a main object in my mind is of course distinct from this. It is to introduce what I consider to be a fundamental principle of reform in electoral systems in this country. I mean to take this as a preliminary step. I believe it to be right everywhere; but it is clear that it is indispensable, at least it may be described as necessary in the reorganization of the southern political communities.

I put the question, then, upon this ground, for the purpose of the point of order: that if the amendment that I offer may aid in executing the acts of reconstruction, may facilitate their operation, may remove obstacles already known or obstacles that may hereafter arise to the system, it is in order, and it will be hereafter for the Senate to determine upon a discussion of the question of the merits of the proposition itself whether it bears this character in point of fact or not. If it may reasonably bear such construction, it is in order, and I am to be permitted to proceed to debate it. I suppose if I had not been interrupted I should have been pretty well through with my main speech by this time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not think the proposition of the Senator from Missouri properly within the rule which the Senate has adopted; but I think the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is. I can well understand why the Chair should be embarrassed in deciding any questions of order that may be raised under this resolution, for there is no intellect, as I think, that is able exactly to decide a question of order under it. In the first place, nothing is in order except that which proposes to remove obstructions which have been thrown in the way or which may possibly in the future be thrown in the way of the execution of the laws of last winter. What obstructions have been thrown in the way? The President has done nothing; he is entirely innocent on that subject. He has taken the advice of his law officer; but he has done nothing—

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana is mistaken; the President has issued an order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. An order carrying out the opinion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He has issued a circular, an order to the district commanders.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that the President of the United States has required that civil officers who have been turned out of office by the military power shall be restored.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He has issued an order, with some fifteen or twenty provisions in it, for their government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not seen it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have seen it, and been furnished a copy of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then he has done something; I suppose that is adopting the views of the Attorney General, making them the policy of the Administration. The question then is, whether these orders are obstructions. That will depend altogether upon the question whether the Attorney General has put the right construction upon the laws of last winter. We come back to that discussion, whether the Attorney General, in the opinion which he has given, has properly construed the laws. I have not heard his able opinion answered; I have seen some attempts at it; but taking the law and judging of it by the rules which govern courts and juries in the construction of laws, I fancy any Senator will find some difficulty in answering his views. But I never have heard that it was an obstruction to the law, that the law officer provided by law should give a construction to it.

The President of the United States is to execute these laws. How? According to their meaning. And how is he to arrive at their meaning in a case of doubt? By taking the opinion of the law officer; and when he takes that opinion and acts upon it, it is not an obstruction, but a just and proper execution of the law. What obstruction Congress may anticipate no individual can tell.

Then the next proposition of this rule is that amendments are proper which give to the acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed. How am I to know what was intended by Congress when those laws were passed? "By the law itself," as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] wisely suggests. There is no other rule of construction that I know of. Then we are to look to the law of last winter to see what was the scope intended by Congress in its passage.

Then, sir, we propose to give the scope intended by that law. That would seem to open up every question that is provided for in the law itself. If the subject is not provided for in the law, then it is not within the scope and meaning of the law. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri was not within the law; it was outside of it; it was attempting to bring something within it. But the proposition to regulate the questions of suffrage, the giving of votes, was within the law of last winter; and so the bill that is before us construes that law. The law of last winter provided for making a registration of the voters. This bill goes on to regulate that subject. It is within the scope of the last law. This bill provides that the board of registration may exercise a judgment upon that point. What is the proper construction of the last law on that subject I do not stop now to discuss; but the Attorney General has construed that law as denying to the board a judgment; he says that the duty of the board is administrative, not at all judicial; and because Congress now is not satisfied with that it is proposed to amend that law and to give the board the power of judging in each case. So also the last law excluded a certain class of men who had held a State or Federal office, and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and who afterward gave aid and comfort to the rebellion. That was within the scope of that law. It is proposed here to limit that, still further to restrict the number of persons who may be registered and who may vote, by providing that if they held office at all, and afterward participated in the rebellion, they shall not be allowed to be registered or to become voters.

The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is further to regulate the subject of voting, and to provide how the votes may be cast. It is within the scope of the law of last winter; it is within the subject upon which we legislated; and therefore I think it is within any possible construction of this resolution. It is within the scope intended by Congress if it is within the subject upon which Congress legislated. I cannot give it any other construction. To say that it is not within what Congress intended to do is to commence guessing now at what the mind of each Senator in voting at the last session may have been. That would be simply ridiculous; it would make this rule folly. The only construction that we can put upon it is that the subject was within the scope of the legislation of last winter. This is upon the subject of casting votes. The Senator proposes by his amendment that when the registered voters come to cast their votes for members of Congress, as provided for in the legislation of last winter, they shall cast a vote for each member that may be elected in that State. Whether it is wise or not is altogether another question; but I think it is within the scope of the legislation of last winter and within this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is: Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania in order?

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall vote that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is not in order, but for a different reason than any that has yet been assigned. I believe that the subject is germane to the bill under consideration; and certainly if the principle of the Senator could be made practicable and convenient I would be eminently in its favor. Any proposition that the honorable Senator or any other Senator can make, in order, that will secure or tend to secure both to the majority and the minority of the people of a fair representation according to their numbers in the Congress of the United States would in my judgment be one of the most important and beneficial principles that were ever propounded to the acceptance of a Congress or a people. But his proposition is necessarily restricted to a portion of the States and of the people of the United States. I admit that my mind is satisfied that if his proposition embraced the whole of the people of the United States and all the States it would be a legitimate and constitutional proposition. It is because it is restricted to a portion of the States, and does not comprehend all of them, that my mind has come to the conclusion that it is not in order to present the proposition; for I do not believe the proposition can be made and restricted to a portion of the States. To be made properly and constitutionally it must be made applicable to all.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to ask the Senator whether this does not fall under the same head as other matters contained in the bill. This is an exercise of special jurisdiction and power in a certain section of the country which we do not exercise in reference to other portions of the Union. I can see no difficulty in the Senator voting on this amendment, as it is not a final vote; and when the measure comes up in its ultimate aspects as finally amended he can vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, Mr. President, I regard the whole subject and the whole proceeding as flagrantly unconstitutional; but if, on the contrary, this proposition was moved to a measure that I considered to be constitutional and legitimate, and it restricted this principle of cumulative suffrage to a portion of the States, I should say it was unconstitutional, and therefore not in order.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Fowler, Hendricks, Norton, Ross, and Sumner—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Craigie, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, How, Johnson, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Williams, and Wilson—24.

So the amendment was held to be out of order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senate has furnished me a very good argument against the passage of this bill. I think no bill of this description should be passed and placed upon our statute-book which does not contain the measure or proposition covered by my amendment; and I propose to enter upon an exposition of that amendment and a statement of the arguments by which it is supported.

The system of cumulative voting has been thoroughly discussed in Great Britain, and is perhaps better understood in that country than in our own. What is it? Where more than one person is to be elected or chosen by a body of electors, the first idea is that each elector may have votes equal in number to the number of persons to be chosen. Formerly in this country we elected members of Congress in the several States by what was called general ticket, under which system each voter in the State voted for as many candidates as there were Representatives in Congress to be chosen from his State, giving to each candidate one vote. That was the system which obtained throughout the United States except in a few States where Representatives (I believe) were chosen by the Legislature. In process of time it came to be discovered that this plan of choosing Representatives in Congress by general ticket was a complete and perfect mode of stifling the voice of the minority within a State. A political majority of only five hundred votes in such a State as New York might send twenty-five or thirty members to the lower House of Congress, while the large mass of the minority voters were entirely disfranchised, although nearly as numerous as those who were thus represented in the other branch.

This system of electing by general ticket was therefore abandoned in a number of the States because of its rank and notorious injustice and because of the dissatisfaction which it produced. The habit, however, of so electing Representatives remained in a number of the States until Congress interposed by virtue of its power under the Constitution of the United States to regulate this subject, and there is now a law upon our statute-book providing that Representatives in Congress shall be selected from each State by districts; each State where more than one are to be chosen is to be broken into single districts and a member elected from each. That action by the States and this ultimate legislation by Congress was for the purpose of doing away with the injustice of the former system. It was to enable the minority, or, to speak in other words, to enable the various political interests of society to have a voice in the councils of the nation, to be heard in these Halls, where laws were to be enacted which would be binding universally upon the citizens. The establishing of the system of single districts for the election of members of Congress was a great reform and a great improvement in American politics; it broke the power of the party majority to this extent, that they could not absorb the whole representation of the State in the popular House of Congress. But when you established the system of single districts you retained still the majority rule for elections in the districts. The majority rule which obtained previously in the States was sent down into these divisions into which the States were broken, and now obtains in the election of Representatives from those several districts. But as society with us has increased in magnitude and in the variety of its interests, inconveniences and evils which formerly were unnoticed or unimportant have grown in magnitude also, and have become exceedingly important, and the majority rule which prevails in the selection of Representatives by districts operates hardly and badly and requires amendment. At least that is my opinion; and in vindication of that opinion, before I conclude I will submit such reasons as have occurred to me in its support.

A majority in a congressional district, although it be a majority of one vote, though it have but a preponderance of one vote over the opposing interest, is entitled to select a Representative, and its voice is heard in the Hall of the people's House. In theory the men who do not vote for the Representative are represented by him; but that theory is simply a falsehood; it is opposed to the fact; it is not true. Instead of representing the men who do not vote for him in his district, the ordinary fact is that the Representative opposes their opinions and contributes all the power which he possesses to render those opinions unpopular and fruitless in the administration of government.

Now, sir, it is a hardship that large masses of the American people should have no voice in the people's House, that they should be shut out from representation in the Hall where popular representation is supposed to prevail with such completeness and perfection. Everybody admits that the fact is so, that there is such disfranchisement; and at some times when the cases are very glaring that disfranchisement arrests public attention and elicits indignant debate.

But we are told that although a minority may be under our present system disfranchised in one district, the opposite party may be disfranchised in another; and so taking the whole State and the whole country together a sort of equilibrium is produced; the party which fails in one district is successful in another, and vice versa; so that when you carry this thing throughout the whole country there is some approach toward justice and a correct result. My answer for that, which is really the main plea for the existing system, is this: in the first place I do not see that the perpetration of injustice in one locality is any compensation for the perpetration of injustice in another; that because a certain minority of voters in Pennsylvania are without a voice in this Government, therefore the non-representation of a different class of voters in Kentucky is justified and made equitable and honorable and of good repute under a republican system. In short, sir, my idea is that when you show me a multiplication of cases of injustice, you have simply swollen your evil in statement and made it more odious, more deserving of blows instead of favor, of opposition instead of support; that the variety of the interests which may be disfranchised under your majority rule as applied to congressional districts is the very fact which pronounces the most weighty condemnation of that rule instead of furnishing it a justification or an apology. Then I have another reply to this suggestion; and that is that it is not true in point of fact that the disfranchisements throughout the country taken together, or the disfranchisements of districts in a particular State taken together, do result in an equilibrium. The fact has never been so; it is not likely to occur; the chances are a thousand to one against it. Therefore, even if there were some soundness in this doctrine of set-off, of setting off one wrong against another, the result would not be the production of an equilibrium of political forces or their just distribution. How was it in the last Congress? Sixteen hundred thousand votes in a particular section of country represented in Congress—the North and West—had but 80 votes; while two million voters in the same section were represented in that same House by 128! Therefore, sir, it is manifestly absurd to talk about the equalization of disfranchisement. There is no such result. There is no equalization.

Mr. President, we have all heard a great deal said in our time about the "sacred principle" that the majority shall bear absolute rule. Well, sir, I deny that there is any such principle in our system of Government; and if it could be established, I should deny that it possessed any sacred character. What is our principle, the principle upon which our republican system is founded? It is that the people shall rule; that they shall rule themselves; that we shall have a system of self-government. Does that mean that a part of the people shall rule over another part? Does that mean that they shall be divided numerically, and that twenty shall absolutely control nineteen; or does it mean volition and action of the whole mass in the business of self-government? We have, however, from what we have supposed to be the necessity of the case, a majority rule at elections. It is a simple rule, nothing sacred in it or about it; an arrangement, a thing of detail, by which we have attempted in a rude manner to apply practically our principle of government by the people; and this majority rule formerly obtaining in the States and applied to a system of voting by general ticket, yet applies in the districts into which the States are divided. It is the same in its nature and to a great extent it is the same in its effects as before, and the very mischief and evil which led to the abolition of the general ticket system yet obtains and prevails in elections in single districts. Though mitigated somewhat, it requires, as I think, the vigorous hand of reform.

I have made these introductory remarks in order to approach the subject in an intelligible manner. What is meant by a system of cumulative voting is this: that an elector in any State, whether he belong to the majority or to the minority, can give his votes for some candidate or candidates who will be elected and who will actually represent him in the Congress of the United States. That is all there is of it. That is the Alpha and the Omega of this whole plan. It is a device by which there shall be actual instead of sham representation in Congress; by which men who come here into the people's Halls shall represent the men who vote for them and nobody else, and by which it shall not happen that nearly half the people of the United States shall have no efficient or fair representation where the laws are made.

How is this object accomplished? The manner of accomplishing it is as simple as the thing is itself. You take the State of Kentucky, about which there is some discussion now, I believe, in the House of Representatives as to membership. She is entitled to nine members in that House. What is proposed is, that an elector in Kentucky may go to the election and vote for nine members, if he choose, to represent his State in that House, giving each candidate one vote, or he may bestow his nine votes upon four candidates if he choose, or upon one or upon any other number less than the whole. All the provision of law that is necessary is that the elector may vote for a less number of candidates than the whole number to be chosen, and he may distribute his votes among that less number according to his judgment and discretion, enlightened or directed by his convictions of public duty. That is simple. It does not require a long explanation here; nor to the commonest-minded man in the country is it necessary to go into a protracted argument in order that he may comprehend it. The Senator from Kentucky remarked a short time ago that he was in favor of this thing if it were practicable. He was in favor of some improvement of this kind.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not mean to say that it was impracticable. I am very ready to receive information as to the practicability of it from the honorable Senator.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Constitution of the United States says you may regulate the manner of electing members of Congress; you have interposed already by law to abolish the evils of the general ticket system by which a majority could elect all the members from a State. Now what I ask you to do is in the same line of reform with that former legislation that you shall go on, and instead of allowing any portion of the people of a State to be disfranchised, you shall permit them so to vote that they shall get actual representation.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will mention as an evidence of my friendliness to his principle, that I was a member of the House at the time that bill was passed, and voted for it; and I was then upon the Committee of Elections, and I made a report in favor of the bill. Some of the States then voted by general ticket, and some did not. Some voted by the district system, with districts entitled to send two or three or four Representatives, as was the case in the honorable Senator's State. That measure was deemed entirely a Whig measure; it was opposed by the Democracy; and there were four States, according to my best recollection, two of which I remember, Mississippi and New Hampshire, who refused obedience to the law, and continued to elect their Representatives upon the exploded general ticket system, defying the law of Congress. But their representation, elected on the general ticket system, was accepted in the next House by a majority. I merely make this statement of my being a friend to that measure to give some assurance to the honorable Senator that I am not hostile to the principle of his proposition.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, sir, whatever may be said of this measure, it is certainly practicable. It requires nothing but an act of Congress of half a dozen lines permitting an elector in any State choosing members of Congress to bestow his vote on any number of candidates less than the whole. Nothing further is necessary than that the votes so taken shall be reported, counted by the secretary of the commonwealth in a State, and the returns signed by the Governor in the usual way, and sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The scheme requires no machinery; it requires no involved legislation; it involves no difficulty in putting it into execution.

Now, let me illustrate how this scheme would work by a particular example. Take the case of Vermont, a State with sixty thousand voters, forty thousand of which are members of the majority party, and twenty thousand of the minority. By act of Congress—the existing apportionment law—that State is entitled to three members. The numbers I have stated are very nearly the exact numbers of voters in that State. Every one at a glance can see what ought to take place. The majority having forty thousand votes should choose two members of Congress from that State, and the minority having twenty thousand votes should elect one member. Then there would be just representation. Then there could be no complaint in any quarter. Then our principle of the representation of the people would be applied in the particular case, and no human being can conceive of any argument or objection against that result.

This system of cumulative voting renders just that result certain—renders it morally impossible that any other should take place; and why? Because the minority cumulating their votes upon a single candidate can give him sixty thousand votes; each elector giving his candidate three votes, it would count him sixty thousand. The forty thousand constituting the political majority in the State, if they attempt to vote for three candidates, can only give them forty thousand each. If they cumulate their votes upon two candidates, which is what they are entitled to, they can give them sixty thousand votes each; so that two men will be elected to Congress representing the majority and one man representing the minority, and it is impossible for either one of those political interests to prevent the other from obtaining its due share of representation.

Take the case of Pennsylvania, with twenty-four members. In that State at the last congressional election there were polled five hundred and ninety-six thousand one hundred and forty-one votes. The majority party polled three hundred and three thousand seven hundred and ninety and the minority two hundred and ninety-two thousand three hundred and fifty-one. It thus appears that there was a majority in favor of one political interest in that State at that congressional election, amounting to eleven thousand four hundred and thirty-nine votes. Multiplying that by five—one-fifth of the population ordinarily being the voters of the State—and you see that that surplus which one party possessed of votes over the other represents a population a little exceeding fifty-five thousand—less one-half the number of inhabitants in the State entitled to a representative in Congress, so that this surplus of votes of one party over the other represents a minority fraction upon a ratio of apportionment of members of Congress to the State. The returns of that election (held in October last) were as follows:

Ratio of votes for a Representative, according to votes polled..... 24,839

Now, sir, what is the result? Judging by the actual votes polled at that congressional election, there should have been an equal division of Representatives in the House, standing 12 to 12; or, if a Representative should be assigned to the majority interest on account of the excess of its vote, the numbers would stand 13 to 11. But in point of fact, under your single district system, the result in that State is that the delegation stands 18 to 6, instead of being equally divided according to the real votes which were polled at the election. But under this system of cumulative voting, what would take place? As each political interest in the State knows that its vote is about the same as that of the opposing one, and that if it attempt to obtain more than its fair share of representation, it may actually lose, instead of gaining, it will be forced to concentrate its votes upon twelve candidates, or upon thirteen at the most, and it is impossible that by any ingenuity or device whatever, it can increase its representation in Congress above about what its actual numbers entitle it to. If it should make the attempt, the opposite party would gain an advantage as the result of the sharp practice attempted upon them.

I have taken Vermont and Pennsylvania. Now take the case of Kentucky. There are nine members of the House elected from Kentucky, all of one political complexion. They are now demanding membership in the House, and they are met by a refusal for reasons which I need not discuss, and which it would be, perhaps, improper to discuss here. Suppose a just system of election had prevailed in Kentucky, would the whole nine have been Democratic members—a clean delegation of one political opinion? No such thing would have been possible. At that election the majority was about forty thousand for the party that prevailed.

Mr. DAVIS. Larger than that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I thought it was in the neighborhood of forty thousand. As I make the number of voters required for the election of a member of Congress, that would represent nearly two members. Therefore the preponderance of one political interest in Kentucky over the other would represent two members. That would leave seven members of Congress to be equally divided between the two political interests: one party having four and the other three, and the result would be that the representation in the House would have been divided, more unequally, to be sure, than in most cases, but still not with gross inequality between the two parties that contend for mastery in this country.

Take the case of Maryland at the last election. You find that representation in the House of Representatives is not just, considering the men who gave the votes by which those Representatives were elected; that instead of there being but one Republican Representative from Maryland, there should be two on account of the actual votes polled in that State. Then, sir, take the case of Connecticut, an election recently held, and a most notable trial of political strength in the North. There, where the vote was a tie substantially, where the preponderance of one side over the other was very slight, not more than about a thousand or thirteen hundred, perhaps, the delegation stands three to one, whereas it should be equally divided according to the actual number of votes polled and returned according to law.

I cite these cases of recent State elections, and elections which on the whole have been favorable to that interest in the country which when the votes are taken in the aggregate is in the minority, and I cite the other two cases of Vermont and Pennsylvania as other illustrations. But nearly every State might be mentioned in illustration of the argument.

Thus, sir, whether you go to the North or to the West, or confine your researches to the central portions of the country, you find gross misrepresentation of the people of the United States in that House, which was peculiarly intended to represent them, and to represent them completely, year by year. The Senate was intended to be a more permanent body, and to possess somewhat of a different character. What I propose, then, is the correction of this injustice, whether it exist in the States I have mentioned or in any other States represented in Congress, and to guard against its extension to the States which you are about to restore under your legislation to their former places in the Union, and with regard to which a reform upon this point is more important than it is to the States of the North, the center, or the West.

Mr. President, I will proceed then briefly to state in succession, not to elaborate, several distinct arguments by which cumulative voting can be sustained, vindicated, and made good as I think against all objection. In the first place, this plan is one of justice; it is recognized as just by every one who hears me upon its mere statement; it will be recognized as just by any man in the country to whom you carry the proposition and submit it for his judgment. It will deal equal, even-handed justice among political interests in the country, whether they exist now or are created by the exigencies of our affairs hereafter.

In the next place, a system like this would bring into public life and keep in public life many able men who are now excluded under your single district system. A man of ability in a State can never reach the Hall of the House of Representatives as a Representative of the people unless there be a majority in his district to send him; and if he commence a career in public life, with high ambition before him, and devote himself zealously to the service of the people, and to qualify himself for high statesmanship, and to take rank in Congress as men take rank in the Parliament of Great Britain, he knows that a little shifting of the political scale in his district will leave him out. Those who agree with him in opinion cannot continue him in the public service. The result is that you have no twenty, thirty, or forty-year men in Congress. They are mostly men of the moment; they are two and four-year men in the House, and the example extends even here. If a member of this body gets reelected his friends think it is a subject for warm congratulation, regard it as a wonderful result to be wrung from a caucus and from managers at home. But, sir, I insist that in this country, as abroad, the House of Representatives ought to be the great House of our Legislature; its Hall should be resorted to for words of eloquence, for profound logic, and for the exhibition of the highest traits of American statesmanship. How is it and how must it be as long as you keep members there two, four, and six years only? They have no opportunity to grow up into distinction; they have no opportunity to mature their abilities and become able statesmen.

The result is that the weight of that House in the Government is far below what it should be. This may increase the relative importance of the Senate; but upon the whole it is not a desirable condition of things, and the continuance of this system of rapid rotation in the membership of the House of Representatives bids fair to be one of those injurious influences which will bring republican institutions into contempt.

I say then, sir, that this system of election by cumulative voting will allow electors of a particular party in a State to continue their favorites in Congress, and will result in improved statesmanship in the House of Representatives, elevating that branch of the national Legislature, and, of consequence, promoting the public interests.

Again, sir, one great advantage of this system is that it abolishes gerrymandering in the States, cuts it up by the roots, ends it forever. That is one of the most crying evils of the time. Now, sir, I venture to say that from Maine westward to the Pacific ocean, in the last ten years, in no State whatever, has there been an honest and fair district apportionment bill passed for the selection of members of Congress. Nowhere, in no State, unless indeed it was in a particular and exceptional case where the two branches of a Legislature were divided in political opinion and one checked the other; but ordinarily, as we know, in the course of northern politics, legislative bodies have been of the same political complexion in the upper and lower houses; and I venture to say that whenever this was the fact, unfair and dishonest apportionment bills were passed.

Under the present system the temptation to party is too great to be resisted; party interests appeal to members of a Legislature, and they yield to its demands and enact injustice into law. The party that does this knows perfectly well that when a future apportionment bill is made, the opposite party, if it be in power, will retort this injustice, perhaps with increased force. Thus you have a competition between political interests with reference to the apportionment of the States continually increasing in injustice, leading to degradation of the Legislature and the corruption of the people. The system of cumulative voting, however, avoiding the creation of single districts in a State, avoids altogether this capital evil and mischief of gerrymandering and brings it to an end so far as the selection of members of Congress is concerned.

Well, Mr. President, in the southern country, as already hinted by me, I consider this system of cumulative voting as indispensable to the harmony, to the welfare of that section of the Union. You have vast masses of voters belonging to two different races there who are to be brought in antagonism to each other at the polls, and that in and through every State of the whole ten now unrepresented. How will you have them vote? Against each other, voting each other down under the majority rule, producing bad blood and riot and turbulence upon thousands of occasions, with widespread discontent and dissatisfaction through the whole social body? Are you going to permit the majority rule of elections to have uninterrupted effect there, causing results like these? Will you make no provision for amendment, for counteracting and countervailing these manifest evils and dangers?

Take the case of Georgia, with seven members. You can see what the result would be under cumulative voting following a regular registration of voters. It could be known beforehand about what number of representatives the colored voters and their white allies were entitled to, and how many representatives under that registration the other elements of population would be entitled to. The election would take place quietly, without collision; neither side could deprive the other of its fair share in the result.

I should like to enlarge on that point, but I shall not do so; for the reason that the decision of the Senate ruling the amendment proposed by me out of order upon this bill does not render a discussion of the effects of this system in those States, in connection with the coming elections, as important as it would otherwise be.

I am going over, as briefly as I can, the different heads of the argument, in order that they may be considered here and elsewhere, because this is not the end of the subject. A proposition which is just in itself, which is capable of being vindicated by debate, which is important and vital to the working of our representative system, cannot be kept down or suppressed. If it be pushed aside at one time it will recur upon us, it will return again and again, until it be determined upon its merits and according to an enlightened public sentiment developed or produced by discussion.

In the last place, Mr. President, this system of cumulative voting will be a most valuable check upon fraud at elections. No measure ever proposed in this Union would have so extensive and salutary an effect in checking election frauds and corruption as this system of fair and honest voting which I defend. Do you not discover at a glance in looking over the States of the Union the main source from which electoral corruption issues, the main cause that brings it into existence? What is that? Why, sir, the motive put before every candidate in every district of the country that is anything like close, the strong incentive and the strong temptation is to corrupt a few votes in order to turn them into his scale and carry his election over an opposing candidate. And when one candidate resorts to this mode of promoting his interests, the opposing candidate feels justified in retaliating in the same way; and thus it is that an iniquity perpetrated on one side begets similar iniquity upon the other. There is a putting of corruption against corruption in the closely contested districts at all events, or most noticeably at commercial points, and our system of government is thereby poisoned at its very fountain. The evil is growing yearly.

As the country becomes denser in population, as wealth accumulates, as the various interests of society become more diverse, its affairs more complicated and dependent upon legislation, this evil of electoral corruption must increase and swell in volume. You must correct your arrangements for elections in order to check it. Cumulative voting will check it. There will be no longer a struggle for district majorities, a struggle for a few votes for one man over another, because one party in a State casting its votes for the number of men or about the number of men it can elect according to its numbers in that State will elect them against the whole world, and there is no motive to corrupt anybody, there is no turning of the scale by any species of illegitimate influence which may be brought to bear. Then no little local interest can come to a political party and command terms from it, command its action. Then no man with his pocket full of accumulated gain can go to election agents and through them corrupt a part of the electoral body to turn the scale in his own favor, provoking thereby similar corruption on the other side. Then illegitimate, pernicious, and selfish interests in a State will not use the machinery of your electoral system for the purpose of poisoning the sources of political power, because there will not be a sufficient motive. It is these contests for majorities between candidates that causes the major part of the evil of which we complain.

Sir, we have not in this regard attained to the full height and depth and breadth of possible evil. But we have declined far below the purity of former times. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] thinks our elections in this country are models of purity, that nobody is corrupted, that there is little departure from honest principles in their management. Notwithstanding his opinion, I consider that this evil is already extensive enough with us to alarm every patriot and every honest man. I could if it were necessary and time permitted put my finger upon cases in my own State which would establish a very different opinion (at least as to that section of the Union,) from that which the Senator from Massachusetts announces.

Let me illustrate the extent to which, under a system of elections by the majority rule, corruption may be carried for the purpose of obtaining these local majorities. I take cases from England—some parliamentary boroughs. In the debate in the House of Commons on the 30th of May last a provision of the reform bill was pending which had been proposed by the ministry for the disfranchisement of certain boroughs, on the ground of the corruption of the electors therein. Four boroughs were to be struck from the list of those to be represented hereafter in Parliament, (whether the inhabitants were to be counted as electors of the counties in which they were located or not was not determined at the last accounts.) There had been an examination by a board of commission of the subject of corruption in those boroughs at the previous parliamentary election. Witnesses were examined under oath; the case of each borough was thoroughly investigated, and the facts were laid before Parliament. What did the report of the commission show? The statement is a startling one, and is as follows:

CORRUPTION IN ENGLISH BOROUGHS.

	Registered Voters.	Impure Voters.
Totness.....	421	158
Reigate.....	912	316
Great Yarmouth.....	1,647	528
Lancaster.....	1,498	916

In Totness and Reigate the corrupt votes were thirty-eight per cent. of the whole; in Yarmouth thirty-two per cent., and in Lancaster sixty-four!

The reason why Yarmouth shows the lowest in this scale of infamy, is that by act of Parliament some years since the freemen were disfranchised, and suffrage was confined to householders; so that the percentage of corrupt voters is only thirty-two per cent.; whereas in Lancaster, a borough of somewhat similar character, the percentage amounts to sixty-four per cent. This is shown by a detail of the voters in Lancaster. There, of freemen, there were 980 registered, of whom 708 were proved to be impure; whereas of the householders, 439 registered, the number of corrupt was only 208. Here three fourths of the freemen were bribers or bribed; whereas less than one half of the householders were corrupted.

These are the facts as proved, and they of course do not include the corruption in those boroughs which was not detected by the commission, of which there may have been a considerable amount. You see here to what length electoral corruption may be carried under the district system—because in England their boroughs are really districts—where the majority or the plurality rule obtains, and where there is a motive for a corrupt man to struggle for the balance of power in order to turn the scale. One great objection I have always had to colored suffrage, and which I have stated upon this floor, has been this: that thereby you cast into the hands of corrupt and ambitious and evil men in this country, a vast opportunity for mischief for using this mass of votes for their own improper purposes. Looking from the practical point of view upon this question, I supposed that it connected itself with the subject of corruption; but if you had a system of cumulative voting in the South, each political party there would have the power to secure to itself due representation in Congress in spite of another; the causes of corruption would be cut off or limited, and you could have a system comparatively pure. Sir, I show you these English examples as a warning, as pointing out to you the great danger to which our representative system is liable particularly in that section with which your measures of reconstruction are concerned.

Mr. President, I had prepared some time since a complete analysis of the recent elections in the States represented in Congress, from the best means of information within my power, for the purpose of showing the operation of our existing system of elections under the majority rule; but, sir, it is not necessary for me to go over that. All I shall say upon that point is that you cannot examine the facts as to any State, taking your figures from any authentic publication, without perceiving that your representative system requires reform; that it requires you to advance from the position that you have heretofore maintained as to the manner in which the right of suffrage shall be exercised by our people; and the further this investigation shall be carried the more thorough will be this conviction.

Mr. President, I have done what I supposed to be a duty in calling attention to this question, presenting it to the consideration of the Senate, knowing perfectly well that it will be again before us, and feeling assured that the proposition will eventually triumph here on this floor and throughout the country, that you will make your plan of taking the sense of the people in the election of members of Congress just, equitable, reasonable, fair; that you will make and shape it according to the information which you now possess, instead of continuing your present imperfect arrangement; that as you extend the basis of suffrage as you make changes in the foundations of political power, you will improve the plans upon which your system shall be worked and made to accomplish its proper objects.

I have in conclusion only to cite authority, which will be brief upon this question. In the first place I will read from an author of the first rank—from John Stuart Mill's work on parliamentary reform, on page 28. He is speaking of districts which shall elect each three members of the Parliament, and is proposing the application of improved modes of voting to them:

"Assuming, then, that each constituency elects three representatives, two modes have been proposed, in either of which a minority, amounting to a third of the constituency, may, by acting in concert, and determining to aim at no more, return one of the members. One plan is, that each elector should only be allowed to vote for two, or even for one, although three are to be elected. The other leaves to the elector his three votes, but allows him to give all of them to one candidate. The first of these plans was adopted in the reform bill of Lord Aberdeen's government; but I do not hesitate most decidedly to prefer the second, which has been advocated in an able and conclusive pamphlet by Mr. James Garth Marshall.

"The former plan must be always and inevitably unpopular, because it cuts down the privileges of the voter, while the latter on the contrary, extends them. And I am prepared to maintain that the permission of cumulative votes, that is, of giving either one, two, or three votes to a single candidate, is in itself, even independently of its effect in giving a representation to minorities, the mode of voting which gives the most faithful expression of the wishes of the elector. On the existing plan, an elector who votes for three can give his vote for the three candidates whom he prefers to their competitors; but among those three he may desire the success of one immeasurably more than that of the other two, and may be willing to relinquish them entirely for an increased chance of attaining the greater object.

"This portion of his wishes he has now no means of expressing by his vote. He may sacrifice two of his votes altogether, but in no case can he give more than a single vote to the object of his preference. Why should the mere fact of preference be alone considered, and no account whatever be taken of the degree of it? The power to give several votes to a single candidate would be eminently favorable to those whose claims to be chosen are derived from personal qualities, and not from their being the mere symbols of an opinion. For if the voter gives his suffrage to a candidate in consideration of pledges or because the candidate is of the same party with himself, he will not desire the success of that individual more than that of any other who will take the same pledges or belongs to the same party.

"When he is especially concerned for the election of some one candidate, it is on account of something which personally distinguishes that candidate from others on the same side. Where there is no overruling local influence in favor of an individual, those who would be benefited as candidates by the cumulative vote would generally be the persons of greatest real or reputed virtue or talents."

In his subsequent work on representative government he has gone elaborately into an investigation of the existing evils of the representative system as shown in Great Britain, and has laid elaborately the foundations of an argument upon grounds distinct from those which I have stated, although in some cases approaching them, for the adoption of this or some other adequate system of reform; and in that subsequent work he repeats his recommendation of the system of cumulative voting as one of sensible and material reform. He, however, proceeds to state that his own opinion inclines to a still further reform, the introduction of a system of personal representation, which I shall not discuss here because the occasion does not invite it, because I do not suppose it is a system which can be within a twelvemonth or within several years debated and understood and adopted by the American people. It is one much more complicated, requiring perhaps a higher state of political experience; at any rate, a more advanced stage of discussion to its comprehension and adoption by our people.

I have quoted the authority of Mr. Mill in favor of the system of cumulative voting as a convenient, practicable, just, and useful measure of reform, confident that his authority will be accepted both by the Senate and by the people of this country as the highest perhaps which can be produced upon a question of this character. Next I quote from Earl Grey's work on Parliamentary Government and Reform, seventh chapter. This is a new edition, published in 1864. He says:

"The first of the reforms of a conservative tendency which I should suggest, and one which I should consider a great improvement under any circumstances, but quite indispensable if any changes favorable to Democratic power are to be admitted, would be the adoption of what Mr. James Marshall has called the 'cumulative vote': that is to say, the principle of giving to every elector as many votes as there are members to be elected by the constituency to which he belongs, with the right of either giving all these votes to a single candidate or of dividing them, as he may prefer.

"The object of adopting this rule would be to secure to minorities a fair opportunity of making their opinions and wishes heard in the House of Commons. In order that it might fully answer this purpose, the right of returning members to Parliament ought to be contributed that each constituency should not have less than three representatives to choose. Supposing that three members were to be elected together, and that each elector were entitled to three votes, which he might unite in favor of a single candidate, it is obvious that a minority exceeding a fourth of the whole constituency would have the power of securing the election of one member. It is probable that in general three members would be thus returned, each representing a different shade of opinion among the voters.

The advantages this mode of voting would be calculated to produce, and the justice of making some such provision for the representation of minorities, or rather, the flagrant injustice of omitting to do so, have been so well shown by Mr. Marshall in the pamphlet I have already referred to, and by Mr. Mill in his highly philosophical treatise on Representative Government, that it is quite needless for me to argue the question as one of principle. But I may observe that, in addition to its being right in principle, this measure would be in strict accordance with the lessons of experience if read in their true spirit. One of the most remarkable peculiarities of the British House of Commons, as compared to other representative bodies, is that it has always had within its walls members representing most of the different classes of society, and of the various and conflicting opinions and interests to be found in the nation. Much of the acknowledged success with which the House of Commons has played its part in the government of the country has been attributed (I believe most justly) to this peculiarity.

The changes made by the reform act, and especially the abolition of the various rights of voting formerly to be found in different towns, and the establishment of one uniform franchise in all the English boroughs, (with only a small exception in favor of certain classes of freemen,) tended somewhat to impair the character of the House in this respect. The greatly increased intercourse between different parts of the country, and the rapidity with which opinions are propagated from one extremity of the kingdom to another, have had a similar tendency; and there is no longer the same probability as formerly that different opinions will be found to prevail in different places, so as to enable all parties to find somewhere the means of gaining an entrance to Parliament for at least enough of their adherents to give expression to their feelings."

And then he goes on with an elaborate investigation and application of this scheme to the House of Commons. There has been, therefore, not only an inquiry abroad, but an assent from minds very differently and variably constituted, in favor of cumulative voting; from Mr. Mill, a representative of radical opinion, than whom there is no one more eminent in political literature; and then, again, from Earl Grey, representing a more conservative shade of political sentiment in that country. Why has not this system been adopted in Great Britain and applied in practice, and why has it not been incorporated in the existing reform bill? Because in that country they have not the same advantages that we have for its introduction. Here our existing States offer the facilities for introducing this plan without inconvenience, whereas in Great Britain, where they have their districts formed, districts which have existed for centuries, where the habits and relations of the people have been formed for long periods of time, until they have become inveterate, it is almost impossible to make up political constituencies upon whom to apply this plan of voting. In our States, however, in nearly all of which more than one member is to be elected by the same body of electors, the introduction of this plan is both possible and convenient.

I conclude, Mr. President, by saying that I shall attach, probably, to my remarks a tabular statement, summing up the results of representation as they are exhibited by the existing system in the composition of the Fortieth Congress, excluding, possibly, the recent elections the returns of which I do not possess. Now, I submit to the Senate, and to whoever in the country may pay attention to our proceedings, or see my remarks on this occasion, that both upon the grounds of reason and authority this proposition has been sustained; and that if it be introduced into this country, whether in one State or in many States, or universally throughout the country, in any event it will bear the character of a material, vital, useful, and necessary reform of our political system.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the proposition of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is not now before the Senate, having been ruled out of order; and I rise, as far as that proposition is concerned, merely to state that if it should be introduced at another time and made applicable to all the States in the Union it would, as I am at present advised, receive my very cordial support. The works of Mr. Mill and of Earl Grey, which have been cited, have been familiar to me for some time, and they have had the same effect upon me that they seem to have had upon the judgment of the honorable member from Pennsylvania; and anything that may have been omitted in the argument adduced by them has been supplied by the honorable member from Pennsylvania. But that subject is not now before the Senate.

My principal purpose in rising was to say a word or two in relation to the opinion of the Attorney General, and only a word or two. The opinion of that officer has been criticised with a good deal of severity, not so much on account of the opinion itself as because it was supposed to have been in contravention of a former opinion which he is imagined to have expressed in what was called the veto message upon the acts of February and March. I feel it due to a friendship of very many years standing, and to a knowledge of the very eminent ability of that gentleman, to say that I know, so far as any intentional purpose is involved of wishing to obstruct at all what he believed to be the will of Congress, as found in their legislation, he is as incapable of it as any man in the country can be. He is a man of unquestioned integrity, private and political. He was a supporter of the Union from the beginning of our troubles up to their close—if they can be considered as now closed—and he is as anxious to have the Union restored as any member of this body can be. He differs with the majority of the body in relation to the policy which the body have adopted and seem still to think the best policy of bringing about that result; but he would hail with delight that result, no matter how it might be brought about.

Those Senators who have criticised the opinion, and who I suppose have read the opinion, I think should have stated that the district commanders, nearly all of them, requested to be instructed as to the meaning of our legislation of last winter. They differed among themselves where they were able to form decided opinions, and in relation to some subjects they were not able to form any opinion; and they requested, therefore, instructions from the Government. The President, receiving that request from those commanders, naturally called upon the Attorney General to construe these laws in the form of an opinion; and that he has done. He has done it, as I think, with very great ability. There are one or two points in which I think he is mistaken. I think he is mistaken in the interpretation which he gives to the oath which was required, and in another particular which I forget, but it is comparatively unimportant. But I do not consider that he is mistaken at all when he says, if he does say, that the military authority by that legislation is not paramount to the civil authority in many respects. The veto message, I think it was stated by my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] was reputed to have been written by him. I know nothing certain upon the point, but I have reason to believe that it was not written by him. I take it for granted he approved of its results. I think, from the spirit and tone of that paper, that I could very correctly refer it to another hand; but I am sure he did not write a word found in that paper which reflects unkindly upon Congress; he is incapable of it.

If the Senate will look at the bill upon their table, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, I think they will come to the conclusion that in the opinion of that committee that of the Attorney General was substantially correct. The first section of the bill states that it was the purpose, it was the intent and is the intent, and the laws of the last session shall be so construed, that the civil is to be subordinate to the military authority. That was so by that act to a certain extent, but it was not so absolutely as we are about to make it. In relation to all civil controversies involving mere rights of property the military commander under the original bill had no control. He could, in the administration of the criminal law, whatever he might suppose that law to be, either call to his aid the local authorities or he could dispense with them altogether and act by means of military alone; but it is very clear, looking to the terms of that law, whatever Congress may have intended or individual members may have intended, that it is not the true meaning of that law, construed by itself, that the military is to be paramount to the civil authority of these several States in all things. Nor could it well have been otherwise. What is to be done in relation to the law of descents, the law of marriage, the law of parent and child, of guardian and ward, and all the other disputes which arise as between man and man? How are they to be decided? Are they to be decided by a military tribunal? If they are, is there to be an appeal? The only appeal that the Constitution gives is to the Supreme Court of the United States. There could be no writ of error to the decision of any military tribunal in a civil case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I take it this law does not change that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that it does. It remains so still, unless the amendment adopted yesterday, which authorizes the military commander to appoint whatever persons he thinks proper to take the place of those whom he turns out, and of course authorizes him to turn out all persons that he thinks ought to be turned out, will lead to that result.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They would still administer civil justice in the same way, in the civil administration, although they would be different persons.

Mr. JOHNSON. How are they to do it? How is a military commander now to decide an action of ejectment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course he does not; but nobody can doubt that if a judge is turned out, he is to put somebody in his place to do it; and so in relation to all the other questions that can arise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He might decide it.

Mr. JOHNSON. He might decide it, but his decision cannot be revised. I was about to say further—for I propose only to detain the Senate a moment or two—when it is said that these civil tribunals are merely provisional, exist merely upon the will of Congress, tribunals of sufferance, the Senate ought to recollect that the Supreme Court of the United States has, since the war terminated, entertained writs of error to decisions of those courts as State courts, and has reversed them. When it is said that these States are not States in the Union now as well as they were before the rebellion, the Senate ought to be informed, if they have not heard of it, that at the last session of that tribunal two cases arose which brought before it for decision that very question in one form. The State of Texas applied to the Supreme Court for the exercise of its original jurisdiction, which can only be exercised when a State is a party and in the case of ambassadors and other foreign ministers, for the purpose of enjoining some wrong which she alleged was about to be perpetrated on the State in regard to the issue of some bonds. I was not in the case; but the point was made that it was not a State, that it was carried out of the Union by the rebellion, that it had never been brought into the Union by any congressional action, and it had therefore no right to come into the Supreme Court as a State and invoke the original jurisdiction of that court. The Supreme Court decided, and as I believe unanimously, that she had a right, and they issued the injunction as prayed.

In another case, in which I was counsel, the State of Virginia filed a bill against the State of West Virginia, claiming that West Virginia was exercising jurisdiction over two counties that originally belonged to the Old Dominion, as they termed it, Jefferson and Berkeley. I demurred to the bill on the ground that the question whether the two counties had or had not separated themselves from Virginia and become a part of West Virginia was one over which the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction, for it was left, first to an election, to the choice of the people of those two counties, and the result of that election was to be passed upon by the Governor of Virginia, and if the Governor of Virginia was satisfied that a majority of the people of the counties were in favor of going with West Virginia he was to issue a proclamation to that effect, and that was done. But the other point that I made—and I wanted the question decided—the other point that I made in the argument was that Virginia was not a State; and I took this ground—the argument has been printed since and I think I have sent it to some of the Senators: I said, first, that the decisions of the Supreme Court upon political questions were not binding upon either of the other departments of the Government. I said, secondly, that upon a question of that kind, State or no State, which was a question in its nature political, it was to be submitted exclusively to the jurisdiction of Congress, as Congress had decided—not that it was my own opinion, but that the legislation of Congress on the subject rested, and could only rest, as I thought, upon the ground that over the question of State or no State, in the sense of the Constitution, that department of the Government had supreme jurisdiction; and as they had decided by the acts of February and March of our last session that these States were not entitled to representation, were not States in the Union, and could not become entitled to representation as States in the Union until Congress should think proper to admit them after they should have conformed to the conditions which Congress might prescribe, that was binding on the judiciary. The case is now held under advisement. I do not know certainly what the opinion of any one of the judges is upon that particular question, but I have reason to believe that again they were unanimous in believing that there was nothing in the point; that Virginia is as much a State now as she was the day she passed her ordinance of secession, and is, consequently, as much entitled now to claim the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as she would have been if she never had gone into the rebellion.

Mr. President, I think with the Attorney General in relation to most of the points covered by his opinion that he has properly interpreted the acts of Congress. I have already said that I think he is mistaken in one particular at least, but I think he has properly construed those acts in almost every other particular; and I rely, in corroboration of the correctness of that opinion, upon the bill on your table. The first section is perhaps inconsistent with the idea that the Judiciary Committee concur in opinion with the Attorney General, and the fifth section may show also that they differ with the Attorney General; but the second, the third, the fourth, and the sixth are all new enactments, not passed, as I understand it, looking to the bill with a view to correct any misconstruction of the original legislation, but passed because, in the judgment of the committee, and I suppose that will be the judgment of the Senate, it is important that some additional provision should be incorporated into the laws before the States come in.

For example, two sections are enough to illustrate what I mean. The fourth section confirms all acts of removal of civil officers by the military commanders and confirms all appointments. Now, what is the use of that if the military commander had the authority to remove under the original law? If he had the authority to appoint, it needs no vindication, no confirmation. It can only, as I think, be because it was supposed at least to be doubtful whether these commanders had either authority, the authority to remove or the authority to appoint.

Now, we come to the next section. That gives, in words, the authority to remove and the authority to appoint. It will not be pretended that those words are in the original acts. That is very clear. It will not be pretended at least that, looking to the original acts, it is not extremely doubtful if the construction is not obviously the other way, whether there was an authority to remove and appoint; and so in relation to the other sections. I consider the bill, therefore, in its main features as confirming the interpretation which the Attorney General has placed upon the acts of February and March last.

A word more, and I shall have done. Perhaps I said it in advance. If the honorable members of the Senate knew that officer as well as I do, and as well as others who have the pleasure of his acquaintance, private and professional, they would not for a moment harbor a suspicion that he would lend himself for any party purpose to misconstrue a law. His duty as Attorney General, his sworn duty when he is called upon by the President or any head of a Department, is to advise them upon legal points as he may conscientiously think the law is. That I have no doubt he has done. Whether he has done it correctly or not on the whole may be a matter subject to doubt; but that he has done it correctly in nearly every one of the points to which he has directed attention in my judgment seems to be clear, with due deference to the members of the Senate who may differ with me. Above all, I think, without meaning to disparage any member of the Senate, that it would be exceedingly difficult for any one of them to answer that opinion in the particulars to which I have adverted so as to carry conviction to a judicial mind.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the bill open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. Mr. SUMNER. Before offering some amendments which I have on my table, I desire to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to the character of this bill.

The subject of reconstruction has been before Congress for many years. It first appeared in the Senate as a proposition of my own as long ago as February, 1862. From that time to this it has been constantly present. If at any time Congress has erred it has been from inaction and not from action. And now the same danger is imminent.

Mark, if you please, the stages. At every step there has been a battle. Nothing could be proposed which was not opposed, often with feeling, and sometimes even with animosity. I do not speak now of the other side, but of our friends on this side of the Chamber, some of whom have fought every measure.

To my mind nothing has been plainer from the beginning than the jurisdiction of Congress over this whole subject. Obviously it was not for the Executive, but for the Legislative. The President was Commander-in-Chief of the Army. That function was his. But he could not make States or constitutions, or determine how States or constitutions should be made. All that he did to this end was gross usurpation, aggravated by the motives and the consequences of his conduct.

Unquestionably the jurisdiction was in Congress; and I shall never cease to lament that it was not asserted promptly and courageously. Our delay has postponed the establishment of peace and reconciliation. Much as the President has erred, Congress has not been without its errors also. The President erred from assuming powers which did not belong to him; Congress erred from declining to assume powers which belonged to it. The sins of the President were of commission; the sins of Congress were of omission. The President did the things he ought not to have done; Congress left undone the things it ought to have done.

In the exercise of unquestioned jurisdiction Congress should at once have provided civil governments, through whose influence and agency the rebel States might have been shaped into republican forms. Such a proceeding would have been more constitutional and more according to the genius of our institutions than that which was adopted. It is hard to reconcile a military government or any government born of military power with the true idea of a republic. Tardily, too tardily, Congress entered upon the work; and then began hesitations of another character. Even when it assumed jurisdiction it halted. For a long time it refused to confer the suffrage upon the colored race. At last this was done. Then it refused to exclude rebels from the work of reconstruction, and when at last it attempted something its rule of exclusion was so little certain that an ingenious lawyer, by a written opinion, has set it aside.

There have been bills with riders, and after the passage of these bills there has been a supplementary bill with riders. And still further legislation is needed. Surely these successive failures have their lesson. They admonish us now to make thorough work.

If you will not establish civil governments, with the military power simply as a support, then at least do not hesitate to vacate the existing governments, which are so many roots and centers of sedition. All the officers of these governments, from the highest to the lowest, exercise an influence adverse to a just reconstruction. They are in the way of peace and reconciliation. They increase the essential difficulties of forming new governments. Through their influence a hostile spirit is engendered and sustained. Such an obstacle should be removed.

At the same time be careful that rebel influence is not allowed to prevail in the formation of the new governments. Of course this can be done only by excluding rebels during this transition period, until the new governments are formed. The rule of exclusion may be properly changed when loyal and republican governments have been established. My attention has already been called to cases deserving attention. For instance, there are naturalized citizens who have taken an oath to support the Constitution and afterward became rebels; but they are not excluded. There are cadets at the Military and Naval Academies; persons who have contributed to rebel loans or invested money in rebel bonds or securities; contractors who furnished rebel supplies; also persons who, as authors, publishers, editors, contributors, or as speakers or preachers, encouraged the secession of any State or the waging of war against the United States.

Considering what we hear with regard to the boards of registration: that in some States they are of doubtful principles; that in some of the States colored persons are excluded, so that a large proportion of the voters have no representation in the boards; it seems to me that we ought by positive words to provide that the boards shall be constituted without distinction of color. Colored persons may be chosen to office, and I cannot doubt that we shall soon welcome colored Senators and Representatives to the national Capitol. Meanwhile the boards of registration must be kept as open as these Chambers; and no commanding general must be allowed to set up a rule adverse to the rights of a race.

A system of public schools without distinction of color should be required. This important duty must not be left to caprice or to the triumph of truth through local influence. Its performance should be enforced as essential to republican government in these States. You have required suffrage for all. You should require also education for all.

Provision should be made to invalidate the decrees of court in the rebel States which have not been voluntarily executed. This is necessary for the protection of loyal persons. Look, for instance, at Texas, where, according to recent report, immense sums have been taken by unjust decrees of court. If the remedy is not applied now, it is doubtful if the opportunity will not be lost forever.

In submitting a constitution to the people for adoption, it seems to me advisable that it should not be complicated by any election of officers, State or national; but that all elections should be postponed until after the approval of the constitution by Congress.

There should also be penalties provided for the violation of the act. The pardon of the President must not be allowed to confer a title to vote; and since officials have shown such a disposition to impair the efficacy of an act by interpretation, reducing it to a mere shadow, we ought to provide that it shall be interpreted liberally.

In making these propositions I ask that you should not hesitate simply because they may not be embraced within the terms of the original acts. Let us do now all that we can to make this measure of reconstruction just and beneficent. I know no other rule worthy of the Senate or adequate to the occasion.

In carrying out these ideas I propose to offer several amendments, which I will send to the Chair in order. I begin by sending to the Chair an amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That every constitution in the rebel States shall require the Legislature to establish and sustain a system of public schools open to all, without distinction of race or color.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment is manifestly not in order under the rule of the Senate. I do not wish to take up time, and perhaps if we can get a vote upon it, it will do just as well as to raise the question of order.

Mr. SUMNER. That is all I ask.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; let us vote.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not desire to debate it; but I should like to have a vote upon it. Let me have the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I must insist upon the point of order, to be consistent with the action that I felt it my duty to take in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. He insists that inasmuch as his amendment was ruled out of order, the same question should be made upon all propositions of like character. This is a proposition to incorporate a provision in the bill which is not to carry out the original reconstruction acts, and I object to it, therefore, as out of order.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to say, in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois, that I do not so much insist upon every other proposition being ruled out of order as I do that if you let other propositions come in that are equally objectionable in point of order with my own the Senate shall reconsider its vote and let mine in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair.) The Chair would submit this question to the Senate except for the fact that the Chair is of opinion that it is exactly within the principle decided by the President of the Senate an hour since; and according to the ruling of the regular occupant of the chair, the Chair now holds this proposition to be out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. I had supposed the proposition would be submitted in another form without compelling me to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. If the Chair will refer the disposition of it to the Senate that the Senate may vote upon it that is all I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That suggestion is entirely agreeable to the Chair, and so the question will be referred to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. The yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment, and I should like to have them on the proposition in that form.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chair can certainly decide the question of order if he is clear in his opinion as to the question of order without referring to the Senate a question about which he entertains no doubt.

Mr. GRIMES. It has been decided two or three times already.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided the question simply upon the precedent established an hour since, but upon the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts the Chair prefers to refer the question to the Senate; and the question is, is the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts in order? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SUMNER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not on that question.

Mr. SUMNER. On the original proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You can have them if you want them.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been ordered on the question now before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall vote for this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts whenever I can do so under the rules of the Senate. I do not apprehend that I can vote for it under the rule which has been adopted, and therefore I shall vote that it is out of order to introduce it.

Mr. WILSON. I think we had better vote on this proposition fairly, without any reference to this matter of rules. For myself I must say it does seem to me we ought to have the privilege of amending this bill as we choose. As to the amendment itself, it is one of those propositions that it is very hard to vote against; and still I have not a shadow of doubt that every one of these States will put this provision in its constitution. The people there of all parties are unanimous for it; and you might just as well require that they shall plant corn and cotton as a condition as to put this in; but still I can appreciate the moral effect of Congress putting it in. There is not a man in favor of restoring these States from here to the Rio Grande who is not in favor of common schools, and as strongly for them as we are ourselves. There is nothing so strong in that part of the country to-day as the proposition to establish schools. Everybody is for it, of all parties and of all kinds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, whether this amendment is in order, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TIPTON (when his name was called) said: Before casting my vote I must say again, I am about to cast another vote in opposition to what ought to be common sense, and in opposition to what ought to be the usage and the rule of the Senate. I suppose that I must come to it, and confess that so beneficent a proposition as that of the Senator from Massachusetts is certainly out of order, and therefore I shall have to vote "no." That is the condition in which we find ourselves humiliated to-day.

The calling of the roll was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 11, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Guthrie, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Williams, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair another amendment, which I am very sure must be in order, even under the stringent rule of the Senate. It is to insert the following proviso at the end of section five:

Provided, That no person shall be disqualified as member of any board of registration by reason of race or color.

I will explain that amendment. I have been told by gentlemen from Virginia that throughout that extensive State, where the colored vote is so numerous and is to exercise so important an influence over the destinies of the State, there is not a single colored person on any board of registration; the general there has excluded them. I feel that he was not justified in so doing. He ought to have constituted his boards of registration differently. They should have had a certain reference to the population, especially to the voters. They have no such reference; and the object of my amendment is to bring the bill in substantial harmony with the facts.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to inquire whether there is any doubt upon the law as it stands now that men otherwise qualified are eligible, notwithstanding they are black; and if there be no doubt on that point, I should like to know how the insertion of this provision will curb the disposition of any commander to make his selections among the whites rather than among the blacks?

Mr. SUMNER. I will answer the Senator, for I am accustomed to that class of questions on this floor. I remember when some two or three years ago I felt it my duty to move on one bill after another, that there should be no exclusion from the cars on the railroads on account of color, I was always encountered by learned lawyers, and by none more constantly than my excellent friend opposite, the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] with precisely the statement which my friend from New York now makes, that in point of law it was unnecessary; that under the actual law, the common law, there could be no exclusion on account of color; and yet, in the face of that common law, Senators about me all know that there was an exclusion from the cars on account of color, and the grossest outrages committed. Colored persons were precipitated into the streets, into the mud, in the rain, and they could get no remedy; and when I asked for a remedy, grave Senators said, "let them go to law; let them apply to the courts;" and it was suggested to me that I, perhaps, had better volunteer as their counsel in court rather than appear in this Chamber. Now the question of my friend from New York is precisely in the same spirit. There is no doubt that—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does this proviso give any remedy?

Mr. SUMNER. There is no doubt that under the existing law there can be no exclusion on account of color; nobody is for that reason disqualified from the exercise of any function. What is there to prevent a colored person from being a Senator of the United States; and who can doubt that within a very few months it will be our business to welcome a colored Senator on this floor? I cannot doubt it.

Mr. JOHNSON. How many?

Mr. SUMNER. That I do not know; but I ask you, who now look to the colored vote in these States as a means of security and peace, through which you are to find protection for this Republic and for your white citizens there as well as for themselves, to see to it that they have not this stigma put upon them by any commanding general who pretends to act by virtue of our legislation. It is not enough to tell me, therefore, that under the actual law colored persons may be designated. To that I reply, in the State of Virginia they have not been designated; and I wish now that Congress should take the matter in hand and say that any exclusion on account of color is without the sanction of law.

And now that brings me to the inquiry of my friend from Illinois as to the penalty I think, or as to the extent of the remedy.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question was whether your proviso afforded any remedy.

Mr. SUMNER. That I will answer. My proviso affords precisely the same remedy that it afforded on the railroad bills. It is just in the same terms. I followed those terms because I know my friend likes good precedents, and we have enough of those on the question of the railroad cars. I think the Senate adopted that proviso at least half a dozen different times. There it is, without any penalty, and yet it has been most efficacious not only in these streets, but as an example throughout the whole country. And now adopt this proviso, and I am sure that it will be most efficacious with all our generals without adding any penalty. Should they exclude persons on account of color, it will be a violation of law; there will be no votes of thanks for them; no hope of golden spurs to-day. And, by the way, though I do not wish to be led aside from this discussion, I feel that I ought not to allude to General Schofield without expressing my doubt whether he does deserve the thanks of Congress for what he has done. I fear that he has been in many respects an impediment to a just reconstruction. At any rate, I have many letters from Virginia to that effect; and I merely call attention to the point simply by way of illustration of the necessity of some intervention on our part that this abuse should cease. The Senator from New York surely will not sustain the reasonableness of the present organization of the boards of registration in Virginia, where in that whole large State, now registering so many colored persons, there is not a single colored citizen on the board. Can he sustain that? Is it not unreasonable? Ought it not to be interfered with? Do not tell me there is nothing in the law to sanction it. It is there; it is done. Let us interfere to set it aside.

Mr. CONKLING. My inquiry was addressed to the case made by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and he answers by a reference to the legislation as to the street railroads here. I do not think the answer is a good one. The law as it stands now—not the common law, not the general understanding of mankind, but the statute law on this very subject—not only qualifies colored men for membership in boards of registry, but provides in different forms that there shall be no distinction as to their qualifications. The Senator tells us that, despite that law, in one State at least, it happens in fact (he no doubt being right in saying that it is purposely so) that all the members of all the boards of registry are white men; and now he proposes as a practical measure to enact, in the language of his amendment, that color shall not disqualify—that is the word—that color shall not disqualify men from holding positions upon those boards; so that we have this case: first, a set of statutes which says much more strongly than this amendment says, because I think it is rather a provision of dilution than of strength—we have provisions which say there shall be no distinction whatever in this respect on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Then we have the defiance or evasion by one of these commanders, the Senator thinks, of those provisions, and we have in this State to which he has referred boards of registry appointed, who have been executing their duties, and the same men to the end, unless we turn them out, are to continue such registers; and now, by way of a practical cure of this evil, a provision is presented to us which says that color shall not in the future be a disqualification to membership of these boards.

Mr. President, I think the Senator will see that to whatever other ends this amendment is adapted it has not the slightest effect in curing the difficulty of which the Senator speaks. In the first place, these boards are already appointed, and are to go on. In the next place, if they were not, if the whole thing was in futuro, when you have already on the statute-book provisions that black men just as much as white men are eligible, and the commander is left to choose, unless you have some provision which is to curb him, which is in some way to rein his natural disposition, it is a mere bull at the comet to repeat over again that black men shall not be disqualified.

Mr. JOHNSON. He might take all blacks.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, he might take all blacks if he pleases; and he might take all blacks under this provision; and so undoubtedly he might take all whites; and therefore my suggestion is that we are legislating in a circle; that we come out exactly where we go in; and that we cumulate upon the statute-book provisions, the phraseology of this particular one being, I submit to the Senator, not quite so strong, not quite so well, not quite so binding as two or three others on this subject now. If it gave any additional strength to the bill; if it tended in any degree to accomplish the purpose which the Senator has in view, I say to him I should vote for it with great pleasure, as I should always have voted for any provision which was likely to prevent the inhumanity, the barbarity, the incivility to which persons of a particular condition or color may have been subjected in the railway cars. But I do not wish, for one, to vote for an amendment which I think carries nothing with it, but which simply encumbers the bill with unnecessary, and, I might say, verbose provisions.

Mr. WILSON. General Schofield made his appointments very early. I regret to learn that no colored men were placed upon the boards of registration. I did not know it was a fact before; for so far as I have seen or heard from General Schofield I have certainly seen and heard that he has a disposition to do what is fair and just in this matter of reconstruction. General Sheridan made his appointments very early, and he appointed no colored men upon his boards. I believe recently there have been some vacancies which have been filled by colored men. General Pope, in making his boards of registration in Alabama and Georgia, put one colored man on every board. General Sickles has not yet appointed his boards; and I have no doubt myself that General Sickles, certainly with the feeling in the country, will appoint some colored men upon his boards. I have every reason to think so because I have conversed with him on that subject. I certainly see no harm that can be done by putting this amendment into this bill. It is not mandatory; it can compel nothing; but it is an expression of the feeling of Congress if it is put in.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the reason why it is useless, because it can compel nothing to be done under it.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment, to come in at the end of the bill as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be no elections of State or national officers under any new constitution until after the same has been approved by Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise the question of order upon that amendment. It is a direct repeal of a clause of the former law which we are instructed to carry out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer that question to the decision of the Senate. The question will be whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I hear no reason assigned for its not being in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is directly contrary to the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. In what way?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law as it exists provides for elections.

Mr. SUMNER. But this is that there shall be no election of officers, State or national, under any new constitution until it has been approved by Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the law we have passed provides for members of Congress being elected.

Mr. SUMNER. But it does not go into details. This goes into details.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is unnecessary to take up time about it; but the Legislature has to be elected in the State and take action ratifying our constitutional amendment; and this is directly at war with the reconstruction acts we have passed instead of being to carry them out. I submit that it is clearly out of order under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether this amendment is in order.

The question being put, the amendment was decided to be in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That in each of these States all judgments and decrees of court which have not been voluntarily executed, and which have been rendered subsequent to the date of the ordinance of secession in each State respectively, shall be subject to appeal to the highest court in the State, organized after the State shall be admitted again by Congress into the Union; but no such appeal shall be allowed unless the motion for the same shall have been lodged in the court or clerk's office of the court in which the decree was rendered within sixty days after the governor appointed under this act shall have entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office; and for all judgments rendered subsequent to such date, within sixty days after the same have been rendered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I regret that my friend from Massachusetts, who must see that this is new legislation, and clearly not in order under the rule of the Senate, should insist on offering these amendments. It compels me to object to them as out of order under the rule which the Senate has adopted. This amendment is clearly not carrying out any provision that is in the reconstruction acts. I object to it as out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer the question to the Senate. It is impossible for the Chair to assume to know all there is in what are called the reconstruction acts; and if I did know I could not judge what would be an obstruction, or what would prevent obstruction. They who made the rule will understand it much better than I do, and therefore I refer it to the Senate to decide. The question is, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts in order?

Mr. SUMNER. I wish the Senate to understand the bearing of this amendment. My attention has been called to the necessity of such a provision as this very often by gentlemen from the South, and especially by lawyers there. They tell me that without some such provision the grossest injustice will be done. Throughout the whole rebellion the local tribunals were sitting to administer justice; but it was not justice, but injustice that they administered. Under their decrees private rights were overthrown; and I doubt not that my friend from Illinois has recently read in the papers an account of an extensive injustice in Texas, where private property to, I should say, an almost incalculable amount was taken away by these unjust decrees. There they are, decrees of court by which property has been transferred.

Should there not be a remedy? I think all will say that there should be. Now this is, if I may so express myself, the last time of asking. If those States are once organized as States and received into the Union, I know not if you have the power of applying a remedy. That you have now I am sure. I cannot doubt your constitutional power at this moment to set aside all those decrees so far as they have not been voluntarily submitted to, or subject them, according to the provision of my amendment, to appeal in a higher tribunal after the reorganization of justice in these States. Is not the proposition reasonable? Is it not to serve the ends of justice? If you do not accept it now, can you accept it at any time hereafter? And if you do not accept it now or hereafter, will not these parties go without a remedy? On that question I do not pronounce dogmatically. I do not mean to say that they will be absolutely without remedy; but I do not easily see their remedy. I see difficulties in the way, while at this moment I see no difficulties in the way.

Then I encounter the objection that this is not in order. Why not? Is not this to carry out your reconstruction bill, to smooth difficulties, to remove wrong, to establish justice? It may not have been specifically foreshadowed in your original bill or the supplemental bill; but I do submit that it is entirely germane to both of those bills. Besides, it is commended by an intrinsic justice which ought to make it accepted at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, is this amendment in order?

The question being put, the amendment was decided to be out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment to come in as an additional section at the end of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of this act, and of the acts to which this is supplementary, shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out.

There is no objection to that on the grounds of order, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment, to come in at the end of section six:

And for the purpose of carrying out this, or any other act of Congress, all persons shall be considered as in the military or naval service as officers of the United States from the date of their being borne upon their respective Army and Navy registers as cadets and midshipmen or acting midshipmen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I must object to that as coming strictly within the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all. It is by way of interpretation. I can explain it so that I think I can have the Senator's consent to it. Our act has been interpreted in this way: that persons in the Military or Naval Academy are not considered as officers in the military or naval service, and therefore excluded when they have gone over to rebellion. The object of my amendment is simply to put persons who, being cadets, naval or military, then went over to rebellion, on the excluded list. That is the whole of it. It is doing it by interpretation. It is declaring that under the list of officers in the Army and Navy we intended to include cadets. Are they not officers, embryo officers? I submit to my friend that his objection is not well taken.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to those persons being treated, and certainly suppose they ought to be treated, as officers who were excluded. I think a cadet in the Military Academy or a midshipman in the Naval Academy is in our service, and I understand them to be in our service.

Mr. SUMNER. But they are not excluded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If they abandoned our service and went into rebellion I think they are within the law; and if an amendment of this kind is necessary to make it more clear I see no special objection to it. I will ask to have it read again. I thought there was something more in it.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Or any other act of Congress." I do not know what that might apply to. If the Senator will strike out those words, I have no objection to the amendment. I will not object to it as a question of order.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what effect this amendment would have upon the pay, emoluments, and rank of these persons? They are not now officers. By the interpretation that is proposed to be given, they will be made officers of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. Only made so for the purposes of this bill, for this act alone. I will strike out the other words to which the Senator from Illinois referred.

Mr. GRIMES. In the first place, not a single military or naval cadet will, I apprehend, come under the operation of it if it receives the construction which the Senator from Massachusetts gives it. I imagine, however, on an examination of it, nobody can tell what the construction will be. The sentence is so involved that nobody can construe it. I call for its reading again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And for the purpose of carrying out this act all persons shall be considered as in the military or naval service as officers of the United States from the date of their being borne upon their respective Army and Navy registers as cadets, midshipmen, or acting midshipmen.

Mr. SUMNER. It is very plain. There can be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sure I cannot tell what will be the legal effect of this language. It is not safe to adopt it in this bill. It is not important, and the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa I think ought to admonish us not to adopt it.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll on the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN (after having first voted in the affirmative) said: I usually follow the committee, and I only voted "yea" because I understood the chairman of the committee to have no objection to the amendment; but as I see he votes against it I shall change my vote and vote "nay."

The result was then announced—yeas 13, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, and Yates—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That any person who shall prevent, or attempt to prevent, the execution of this act, or either of the acts to which this act is supplementary, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

I take that from the House bill. It seems to me it is an improvement on ours. Ours has none.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is an unusual provision to insert in a bill of this kind. I know it is in the House bill, but I think it is obnoxious to objection as coming within the rule under which the Senate is acting. But whether that is so or not, it is an unusual provision, and I myself would not insert it. I do not believe in that kind of legislation. I shall not, however, raise any question of order in regard to it, for I am not sure but that it is in order. I submit it to the Senate; if they think proper to adopt it, very well. I shall take up no time about it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the amendment might be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I will ask if the Senator does not mean to limit that to those who attempt to prevent it by force?

Mr. SUMNER. Should it be so limited? Is not the offense the same whether they do it by force or in any way? Suppose they do it by fraud?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose they do it accidentally; are they liable to punishment for a misdemeanor?

Mr. SUMNER. They must show an intention.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose that some one, putting a different construction upon the act from what we do, thinks that something is attempted to be done under it which the act does not authorize to be done, and commences a suit; or suppose the Attorney General should give an opinion, by and by, upon some clause of this act which is different from our opinion of its true construction, would that be regarded as an attempt to prevent the execution of the act?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Kansas says yes; and would it subject him to a fine of $5,000? I suppose if that consequence would be entailed upon the Attorney General it would be entailed upon any other lawyer who should be consulted by his client, and should happen to give a wrong construction of it, and subject him to a fine of $5,000. I guess I will vote against it, if that is the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the Senator from Massachusetts first proposed this amendment, it struck me favorably upon general principles of law that there ought to be a penalty attached to every infraction of the law; but when I am reminded, and recollect that this bill is a military bill, and the bills to which it is supplementary are military bills, and that in these bills it is provided that all infractions of these laws shall be prevented by force and punished by a trial by military commission, it appears to me that if we were at the end of this bill to put on this penal, municipal section, providing for a penalty, which implies a civil court of the United States to enforce it, an indictment by the grand jury and a trial in a circuit or district court, we undoubtedly oust, by express enactment of this section, the military tribunals and the military commander of any power to prevent the violation of these laws. Hence, in my opinion, it would be entirely mischievous, as I reflect upon it, to interpose a civil penalty of this kind at the end of the bill, which, as it appears to me, we should run great risk in doing by entirely ousting the military jurisdiction of the commission which we intend to try all objections to this measure on the spot.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Williams, and Yates—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Wilson—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer an amendment to insert at the end of section five, the following:

But in every case of a refusal by the board to register an applicant, and in every case of striking his name from the list, as hereinafter provided, the board shall make a note or memorandum, which shall be returned with the registration list to the commanding general of the district, setting forth the grounds of such refusal or such striking from the list.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A great many amendments have been proposed to this bill, which, in themselves, seem right enough at first blush, and this is of that character. But the difficulty about this amendment, and some others is, that it makes the bill so cumbersome that we could never execute it. I submit to my friend from Michigan, that if all the boards of registration in the South, of which there must be hundreds, are required to note down opposite the name of each person whom they strike off the list or add to the list, the reasons for so doing in brief, and that is to go to the commanding general, you will have a mass of returns that it will be impossible to examine and pass upon; and by this provision you give the commanding general no power to revise them. When he gets them what is he to do? It seems to me that it will encumber the bill and will add so much labor and machinery that it will be difficult of execution. The object which the Senator from Michigan has in view, of having these lists correct, having nobody on them who ought not to be on them, and everybody admitted who ought to be admitted to register and vote, I of course entirely concur in; but I think we had better leave the bill in this respect as it is. This amendment would make it so cumbersome that it would be difficult, if not impracticable altogether, to execute it.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly the labor implied by the amendment which I have offered would somewhat increase the labors of the various boards of registration; but we pay those gentlemen for their services, and I suppose we shall pay them liberally. I do not apprehend that they will complain particularly of being kept in the public service under good pay.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that a very broad judicial discretion is given to the various boards of registration by this bill. It is for them to determine, according to the terms of the bill, who shall be registered and who shall not. Their judgment on that particular question is absolutely final, and there is no appeal from it to any tribunal or any person in the world. I see the necessity plainly enough of giving to these boards some judicial power, some ability to inquire into the qualifications of persons who present themselves for registration beyond and outside of the mere oath which the applicant may take and present to the board. I do not believe with the Attorney General that even under the law as it now stands, the taking of the oath is of itself conclusive to show that the applicant is a voter; but in order to remedy that difficulty which has been raised by the Attorney General, the Committee on the Judiciary of this body have very properly incorporated in this bill a sort of judicial authority to inquire and hear and decide upon the qualifications of applicants for registration; but they put no sort of constraint or qualification upon this power. The power is of such a nature as expressed here that it may be very easily abused. For instance, it is very possible to occur that there will be boards of registration who will take it into their heads that a negro shall not be allowed to register his name at all; and there is an opportunity for the exercise of this power in every conceivable whimsical way, much to the injury of the honest applicant who is entitled to vote. Again, the same unlimited discretion is given to the board over the question of striking the name of a person who has already registered from the list for causes which they may see fit to be governed by. They are made responsible to nobody. There can be no inquiry made into their action.

The object of my amendment is a very simple one. It is to require them, whenever they reject an applicant, to state briefly, in the form of a memorandum, not on the list itself, as seems to be the idea of the honorable Senator from Illinois, but in some way—it may be upon a separate piece of paper or in a separate book—the grounds of the rejection of the applicant; and in cases where a name has been registered and stricken off by the board, requiring them to state the reasons why the name is stricken off. These memoranda accompany the list of registered voters, and pass into the hands of the commander of the district. They are there for preservation, of course. When these constitutions have been made in pursuance of this registration, and the election and ratification by these same voters after the constitutions have been made, they are to be submitted to us for our examination; and unless we are satisfied, in the language of the supplemental act of March last, that the thing has been fair and without fraud, we are not bound to ratify the constitutions, or to admit the State into the Union. This memorandum will therefore be the only evidence which it will be in the power of Congress to obtain, of an official character, to demonstrate fraud, irregularity, force, violence, or any other objection which may in fact arise against the ratification of the Constitution. We can send for them; we can call on the general himself, or by a call made through the Secretary of War, or through the General of the Army, we can obtain this same information; and I do not think that the memoranda will be so voluminous as to make it impossible for us to handle them or use them.

I differ somewhat from the Senator from Illinois in that respect. I think they will not be very voluminous, and that they will not greatly increase the labor of the boards of registration. But, after all, unless we enact some such clause as this, these boards of registration may exercise their authority unjustly, whimsically, injuriously to the voters, or to some class of voters, and the case be absolutely without remedy, unless Congress should see fit to issue a roving commission to take the testimony of a thousand different witnesses to prove fraud and irregularity in the election. I really think the amendment had better be adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not; I think this is the last amendment to be offered. My friend from Massachusetts told me he had no more. I think we can get through with the bill in thirty minutes.

Mr. CAMERON. I am afraid not. There will be so many amendments offered.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us go on and try a little while.

Mr. CAMERON. I think we had better take a recess, and meet again at eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not want to meet in the evening if we get through the bill, and I think we shall get through in thirty minutes if the Senator will let us try.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, I will give you fifteen minutes. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, for the simple reason that I think it is the only restraint, check, or limitation that is put upon these boards if they do wrong and illegal things. There is no report provided for; there is no mode of ascertaining what they are doing, and there is no check. As this is a check, I shall vote for the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—yeas 14, nays 11; no quorum voting.

Several SENATORS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Harlan, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, and Williams—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise, Mr. President, to state an objection to the passage of the bill and to read a few authorities in support of that objection, not to occupy much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will yield the floor, I will move that we take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not go right on now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There are some personal reasons.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may hold on to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. I think it is evident that we must have a night session.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand that the Senator from Kentucky, who is entitled to the floor, expresses any inclination for an adjournment; on the contrary he is ready to proceed; and I do not see why other Senators should interpose.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe the Senator from Kentucky is willing to yield. I think it will be more convenient to all of us to take a recess now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor for the motion that is indicated?

Mr. DAVIS. I am willing to abide the pleasure of the Senate in relation to proceeding or taking a recess; but my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] requests me to give him the floor for a moment to offer an amendment. I am disposed to afford him that courtesy.

Mr. CAMERON. We shall have to occupy a great part of the night before we get through with this bill, and therefore I think we had better take a recess, so that gentlemen may go home and get their dinners and come back here and go on. My motion is that the Senate now take a recess until eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that motion will not prevail. It is known, I presume, to the members of the Senate that the House of Representatives have taken a recess until that hour, eight o'clock, with a view of acting upon this bill to-night. I myself have been approached by some members of the House to know if we could not get this bill through so that they may have it to-night. There is great anxiety to have early action upon it. We have arrived at that stage in regard to the bill that I think the amendments are entirely through, except, perhaps, a verbal amendment which my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] thinks of suggesting; and at this hour I think we may finish the bill in a very short time, and let the other House have it, and then we can adjourn until to-morrow. There is no object in our being here to-night. If we go away now and come back after an hour or an hour and a half, the result will be that new debates will spring up which are exhausted at this time, and we shall be here perhaps through the whole night, and pass the bill some time tomorrow morning; we all know what these night sessions are; and by that course the House of Representatives will have no chance to act on it to-night. I appeal to Senators, when we have the bill in this condition, to stay an hour and let us finish it. I hope the motion for a recess will not prevail; and on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well, Mr. President, I am never alarmed at anybody calling for the yeas and nays, for I think a Senator ought not to be afraid to cast his vote. But, sir, I do not believe this question is going to be decided within half an hour, or an hour, or an hour and a half. If I did I should be content to wait; but I believe it will take hours yet to dispose of the bill, and I think it is better for the interests of the country that the question should be decided deliberately. I propose, therefore, that we now take a recess until eight o'clock. I believe if we do not do this we shall occupy a great part of the night. I want to give my friends a chance to go home and come back prepared to dispose of the measure in good feeling and temper. I think we shall save time for ourselves and do good to the country by this course. You cannot curtail this debate. My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] may smile as much as he pleases. Young gentlemen think older ones are not so wise as themselves. [Laughter.]

I want this question disposed of this week. I want the bill to be sent to the President, and I want him to take the responsibility of signing it or sending it back. If he does so at once, we can go home; but if he does not, we may have to wait ten days under the Constitution until he decides. I do not know what he will do; but it is for him to take the responsibility. I hope we shall go away now and come back three hours hence to listen to what gentlemen have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been asked for.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate now take a recess till eight o'clock.

The question being put, the motion was declared to be rejected.

Mr. CAMERON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Davis, Hendricks, Norton, Ross, Thayer, and Wade.—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates.—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Guthrie, Harlan, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, and Williams.—19.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the Senator from Kentucky proceeds, I desire to suggest an amendment in section seven, line nine, to strike out the word "three" before the word "days" and insert "five," so as to give five days for an examination of the registration lists.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is merely extending the time two days, and persons somewhat familiar with the registration in these States seem to think three days is too short. I have no objection to its being changed to five.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.] The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole have made several amendments to the bill, and the question is in concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for a separate vote on the first amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be excepted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the amendment relating to the appointment of civilians?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the vote be taken on all the other amendments together, unless some Senator asks for a separate vote on a particular amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question will be taken on concurring in all the other amendments, with the exception of the one named by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment excepted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section two, line eighteen, after the word "Army" to insert the words "or by the appointment of some other person;" so as to make the clause read:

And upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the approval of the general aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment of some other person to perform the same.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say a word on that. This amendment was adopted, I believe, by a vote of twenty to fifteen in committee, and a number of Senators who supported the amendment at that time did so upon the ground of curtailing the military authority and not confining this work of reconstruction to that class of appointees. Now, sir, I do not know that I have a very clear impression with regard to the whole machinery to be applied in the southern country under the former laws and under the present; but I think the complexion of the enactments, taken together, is extremely partial; that they will in effect, if not in intention, be calculated to produce unfairness at the elections. I do not know what was the motive actuating the committee in providing that these appointments should be confined to military officers and subordinates. I believe there has been no statement of the reasons which operated on the committee to carefully insert this provision in the bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] I believe stated that there were not officers enough already detailed on service in that section to fill up all these boards, or to fill up the vacancies in all these boards. It seems to me our Army is sufficiently numerous for that purpose. We know that we have a large superabundance of officers, as compared with the rank and file, in the military service, and if there be a demand for officers of inferior ranks liable to be appointed for the performance of these duties, I dare say there will be little difficulty in detailing an adequate number, and having the business pertaining to elections, so far as is contemplated in the former laws, carried on by military officers, making the whole system homogeneous throughout, and confining the action to the military of the country, who will be responsible to the law and responsible to public opinion.

Now, sir, I am afraid that under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts—perhaps he has not sufficiently considered the effect of it, nor looked at the consequences—these appointments will all become exclusively partisan; that they will be selected from the most violent, perhaps the most unfair men politically; and that a very considerable effect will be produced upon these southern elections in regard to fairness. We know that in the large districts of country over which these laws operate there were few persons—scarcely any persons of position, of standing, of capacity—who were not in some way connected with the rebellion; and under these laws it is impossible to appoint persons to these offices who are not qualified to take what is called, in derision sometimes, the "iron-clad oath." That oath confines these appointments, therefore, to two classes of appointees, to wit, military officers or privates, and those few persons, perhaps not always men of character and competency in the southern communities, who can take that oath and who were not connected with the rebellion.

Now, sir, I would leave it to these military commanders, in making these selections, to select honorable and competent men in the several communities where the work is to be done; and I see no more reason to confine them in their choice in this respect than there is to confine the right of voting at the elections still more stringently than it is confined by the former law.

By the acts passed in March the whole machinery of registering these voters is committed to our five military commanders. We know that they all belong to the political majority in their opinions. Very extensive powers are given them, not only in making these appointments, but in superintending the whole proceeding afterward; and you give them power to fill all vacancies. They go to their work with the inclination on their minds, or the disposition on their minds, to favor a political party in the administration of this system. If they do not carry it beyond the bounds of fairness and justice we cannot complain. Then, in the next place, you have spread within this whole section of the country the machinery of your Freedmen's Bureau, with its numerous agents and its enormous disbursements of the public money; and we know that all the appointees of that Bureau sympathize politically with the party in the majority, and that taken together they constitute an enormous political influence, distributed through the whole of this section of country with which our legislation is concerned.

Now, sir, by the present supplement which you are about to pass, you give to these military commanders additional powers over this proceeding of the election. They are to appoint all the persons who are to hold the elections, every election officer; and the presumption is, that there will not be a single appointee put upon those boards, in view of the fact that they are required to take the iron-clad oath, and in view of the fact that they are appointed by these military commanders, whose political sympathies are not in a particular direction; or at all events, so far as appointments from the Army are concerned, they will be men who do not sympathize with the South or entertain any secession proclivities.

Now, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is to permit appointments to be made out of the political class of civilians to complete these appointments and make the political complexion of this machinery complete and sweeping from beginning to end. Is it not sufficient when you exclude the men who participated in the rebellion from having anything to do with the registry or the holding of the election? Is not that a sufficient guaranty? If it be possible, then, to appoint military officers of inferior rank under these commanders, who will select prudent and proper men no doubt, if it be possible to appoint such persons to hold these elections, there will be a greater guarantee against fraud, against injustice, and against infamy and disgrace as connected with these elections. It looks to me that we do require some provision of this kind in the form in which it was reported from the committee to secure this system from falling entirely into the control of a political interest inflamed by warm and ardent passions, and making the whole system of reorganization odious.

Now, sir, I submit to the inevitable. I take these laws as they have been passed. I obey them as a citizen. I respect them, so far as I am called upon to respect them, in my public capacity. I am, for the time being at least, content that they shall be executed in a fair and reasonable manner, and according to the spirit and intention with which they were enacted originally; but do not by amendments of this kind give such a complexion to this legislation as will render it odious and will provoke great dissatisfaction, and render the system much less satisfactory and the people concerned much less harmonious in regard to it.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not detain the Senate by further discussing this question. It was very fully discussed the other day. I will simply say that I trust the Senate will concur in the amendment. I do not think six hundred thousand or seven hundred thousand men ought to be entirely cut off and excluded from any participation in their government. Nearly all the offices held in those States under State authority, are held by men who have been appointed or elected for their devotion to the rebellion. That is the truth about it; while the Union men and the moderate class of men who have been compromised more or less in the rebellion are almost entirely excluded. I do not expect many changes to be made. If a change should be made for cause, it is certainly better that a person living there, knowing the people, knowing all about the laws and institutions of the State, should be appointed, than to pick up somebody out of the Army. I will state further that it is a fact that we are very short of officers in that portion of the country as we are in others. I state it, too, on authority.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew the proposition which I made before on which there was a tie vote. It is to insert at the end of section five the following proviso:

Provided, That no person shall be disqualified as a member of any board of registration by reason of race or color.

That is the only amendment I have to offer. If Senators will vote for that I shall not trouble them again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As we are to have the yeas and nays upon the amendment, I wish to state my reason for voting against it, but not to take up any time. I entirely agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that no such distinction or disqualification ought to exist. The existing law absolutely prohibits any disqualification, which is the language of his amendment. But a disqualification or the absence of it is one thing, and the privilege of the military commander to select from among the whole body of those who are not disqualified is another thing. Now, my only objection to this amendment is what I have said and the fact that the law is exactly so now, and if we put a limitation of this description upon this section, it may lead any adverse official, who wants to construe it otherwise in the other section about appointments to civil offices, to say Congress intended to have this qualification to the other parts of the bill, because they have not put on a similar proviso. The amendment does that harm, and for that reason only, I shall vote against it.

Mr. SUMNER. I will not spend any time upon it. The point is, there has been an abuse which has come to our knowledge. We know that in whole States colored persons are excluded from the boards, and it seems to me that that justifies our intervention in that case. The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Edmunds, Hendricks, Patterson of Tennessee, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume it is well understood in the Senate that the House has passed a bill on this same subject. We have now perfected a bill which has been under consideration in the Senate, and I believe considered all the amendments that any one desires to offer; and with a view of facilitating business between the two Houses, and that the action of the Senate may go back to the House as an amendment to their bill rather than send them a new bill, I move to lay aside the bill under consideration, the Senate bill, with a view to take up the House bill No. 123. If the Senate sustain that motion, I shall then move as a substitute for the House bill, by way of amendment, the matured bill of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to lay aside the bill before the Senate, and proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unless some Senator desires it, I will not ask to have it read through. It has been on our tables, and been read twice before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be dispensed with, unless called for by some Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to amend this House bill No. 123 by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting what I send to the Chair, which is the perfected bill upon which the Senate has been acting during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves an amendment by way of substitute, which will be read if it is called for.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Clerk has prepared the copy.

Mr. GRIMES. We all know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment will be dispensed with unless called for by some Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the bill upon which we have been acting that I have sent to the Secretary's desk. The Secretary has put upon our bill the amendments which have been made; and that is the bill which I now offer as a substitute for the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by way of substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read a third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, and Patterson of Tennessee—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cole, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—15.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next, and a concurrent resolution for an adjournment of the two Houses from the — day of July to Wednesday, the 13th day of November next, in both of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MAURICE RICE EVANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose that ought to lie on the table. To consider it is a violation of our rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would yield to me a moment, that I may make a statement about that resolution. I do not know that the Senate will consent to make an exception of this measure, and yet I trust the Senate will indulge me in saying a word about it. It is the case of a young man who was nominated for appointment to the Naval School; and when he was nominated he was of the proper age to be sent there, and he is now of the proper age to go there; but unless a special examination is consented to by the Secretary of the Navy there will be no opportunity for him to be examined until some day in September, by which day his age will be greater than that falling within the statute. The Representative of his district made application to the Secretary of the Navy to dispense with the rule in some way or other, and was answered that except by a relaxation of the rule by Congress it cannot be done.

Upon this statement being made to the House of Representatives that House passed this joint resolution, and it comes here to us. The person to whom it relates I am told is a young man of great merit; there is every reason why he should go to the Naval School, and no reason why he should not; but his nomination reached here so late that he was not included in the general examination, and there is no other examination until September, by which time he will, for a technical reason, have lost forever eligibility to the Naval School. It seems a hard case; the House thought so, and passed this resolution. It is here; and it occurred to me upon the suggestion of the Representative to whose district he belongs that it might be the pleasure of the Senate to dispense with the rule that we have adopted and allow this resolution, being a matter so formal and so obviously unobjectionable, to pass. I do not wish to press it unduly upon the attention of the Senate; but if I can have the consent of the Senate to take it up I will ask that consent, or do it in the form of a motion to rescind our resolution for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution can be considered by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator allow me to lay before the body a communication from the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion for a moment in order that we may—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the Chair to lay some papers before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator from Illinois will withdraw the motion when I appeal to his kindly feelings. I know he will, for I am sure he has a warm heart. Here is the case of a boy who, by no wrong or fault on his part, is excluded from examination; and all we ask is that you suspend your rule for a moment to allow this joint resolution to be passed, which merely gives him a chance to be examined as to his qualifications for the Academy. Who knows but that by sending him there you may send one who will prove to be a most able man when his time of service comes?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We are gaining nothing by this debate. I insist on the motion to adjourn, unless there be a desire to lay before the Senate the papers on the President's desk.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 6th of March last, the report of Brevet Brigadier General Simpson on the Pacific railroad and branches, submitted to the Secretary in February, 1867.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that those papers lie on the table.

Mr. HOWARD. And be printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope they will not be printed.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I withdraw the motion to print until there can be an examination of the papers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 11, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMBERS SWORN IN.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to announce that Mr. RICHARD D. HUBBARD and Mr. WILLIAM H. BARNUM, members-elect from the State of Connecticut, are now present, and desire to take the oath of office.

Messrs. HUBBARD and BARNUM presented themselves, and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the concurrent resolution relative to adjournment, which was pending when the House adjourned last evening. On this question the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have agreed to yield temporarily to several gentlemen who desire to introduce business to which I understand there will be no objection.

AMERICAN SHIP-BUILDING INTEREST.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the causes of the present decline of the ship-building interest in America; how far such depression is attributable to Congressional enactment, and how far it may be remedied by legislation, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

BOUNTIES OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed, be requested to inquire into the expediency of amending the act of 28th July, 1866, giving additional bounties to soldiers, so as to provide that, in case of the death of the soldier, after his discharge from the service and before receiving the bounty, the same shall be allowed to his heirs.

PRIVILEGE OF RECORDING VOTES.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD,] just sworn in, the privilege of recording his vote, as he desires to do, upon the reconstruction bill passed by the House on the day before yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That would be contrary to the rules of the House. The Chair has no knowledge that the rules have ever been suspended to allow any gentleman, not a member of the House at the time of the passage of a bill, to record subsequently his vote upon it. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] desires to test the question, he can do so at some time when there is no privileged question pending. Such a thing as the gentleman proposes has never been done heretofore.

MAURICE RICE EVANS.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I desire unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next; and before the question is put I ask consent to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] to make a statement?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Mr. Speaker, when I was notified to send in the name of a candidate for appointment as a cadet in the Naval Academy, I supposed, misapprehending the law, that I could wait as I have done heretofore in reference to such nominations, as well as the nominations for appointment to West Point; and hence I postponed sending in a name until I should come to Washington to attend the present session. I went to the Department this morning for the purpose of presenting the name which I have for some time intended to present, that the candidate might be examined next September, when, as members will recollect, there is to be an examination of those who did not appear at the examination held between the 20th of June and the 1st of July. I find, however, that the young man whom I had intended to nominate will be eighteen years of age next August, while the law provides that the applicant for admission must be between the ages of fourteen and eighteen at the time of examination. But for my misapprehension of the law this young man would have presented himself at the examination in June last. All I desire now is that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to admit to examination this young man in September next when others are to be examined, in the same manner as though he had appeared in June.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him whether this applicant is black or white?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. He is white. I can see no objection to the introduction of the resolution.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOX, by unanimous consent, was permitted to record his vote in the negative on the bill reported from the select Committee on Reconstruction and passed day before yesterday.

IMPEACHMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not, so far as I am concerned, propose to defer any further to the action of the committee. I believe that the committee have acted in good faith in this matter, but I am willing to trust to the judgment of the House as to whether there shall be a session in October.

The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is objectionable to me in this particular in addition to the objection I made yesterday to his proposition, that the assembling of Congress in October should be contingent on the will of the majority to appear; and that reason is this: we know to-day distinctly and as well as we shall know in October next whether it is expedient to meet in October for the purpose of hearing the report of the Committee on the Judiciary and discussing the subject finally on that report. But I do think it is due in view of the gravity of this proceeding itself with reference to the charge before the House and a new proceeding in the history of this Government that will stand as a precedent for good or for evil; I say, sir, that it is due to the dignity of this House, to the reputation of the person accused, and to the character of the proceeding which shall remain after we have passed away, that we should find the time necessary for a fair and just judicial consideration of this question, and that we should not leave the matter to be involved in the mazes of party warfare which must exist during the next twelve months. It is an objection putting aside personal considerations, and putting aside considerations involved in the elections in certain States which cannot take place until November next; but it may be well suggested to gentlemen here who are personally and locally concerned in November next that the discussions may go on here if a quorum be present, and perhaps a quorum can be commanded in their place; and as what is said here is matter of public record, they can form a judgment on the proceedings nearly, if not quite, as well absent from the House as if present, it being only necessary that a quorum should be here for the purpose of considering this matter. Therefore if the House is ready for the vote I will call for the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I appeal to the gentleman to let me offer an amendment to adjourn until the 11th of November.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot consent to that. My conviction of the necessity of our meeting in October is so great that I cannot yield to it on my own judgment, but I shall accept the determination of the House.

Mr. PIKE. Let me say, then, that I propose to move an amendment, if I get the floor, to adjourn until the 11th of November, without any reference to the question of impeachment. I do not think that this House should hasten its meeting one day on account of the impeachment. I do not believe that the country wants to involve this question of impeachment in its business, as it must lead only to disturbance. I believe the country wants peace, that it wants time to recover from the waste of the war; and so far as the individual in the White House is concerned, it seems to me to stand in this way: that after having destroyed him politically, the only question that remains is whether we shall mangle his corpse. [Laughter.] For one I do not wish to excite the public sympathy in that way.

While saying this I do not wish to preclude any action on facts not within my knowledge. If the Judiciary Committee have facts not within the public knowledge sufficient to warrant impeachment, then, sitting here in my capacity of a Representative, I shall vote for it; but so far as public developments are concerned, for one I believe I act in consonance with the sentiments of the country, as I know I do with my own sense of right, if I shall not vote for that impeachment.

I place my motion to amend on other grounds. I desire an earlier meeting of Congress so that we may have an earlier adjournment in the spring. I think if we meet in November we may adjourn in May, and that the public business will be much better done; that it will be more fully and properly considered in November and December than in June and July next year. I hope, therefore, the previous question will be voted down, so I may have an opportunity to move my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is coming to what I supposed it would. There seems to be an idea growing in certain quarters of the House that the President was an innocent man, that he was a suffering man, that the country sympathized with him, and that Congress had been wrong all the time. It was coming to be the idea in certain quarters that it was vastly better to have a man in the White House who had persistently refused to execute the laws, and who would refuse to execute them, than a man who would execute them if he had the opportunity. When the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] said that the country did not want impeachment, he must have meant the country "away down East." [Laughter.] So far as the country about Lancaster was concerned there had never been any difficulty about it. I believe that the whole country believe that articles of impeachment ought to have been reported long ago. I believe that the delay is not in accordance with the sense of the community, is not in accordance with their sense of justice or propriety.

I have said this much in answer simply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] which I do not believe express the views of one out of every hundred of the genuine Republicans of this country. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his indulgence, and I will not trespass longer upon it, only wishing that the House might order a report at least partially at this session, so that the country may understand whether there is anything worthy of impeachment, or whether this movement is all against an innocent man, in whose favor gentlemen will vote against all impeachment.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the indulgence of the gentleman from Massachusetts for one moment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. SPALDING. I said yesterday that at the conclusion of this debate I should interpose a motion to lay this resolution on the table. I give notice now that I shall not do that if the previous question is voted down, but shall offer an amendment to the same effect as the resolution under which Congress is now assembled, namely, that we meet, provided a quorum appears in each House, on the 16th day of October next, the same day named in the resolution. I have drawn up such an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] has already given notice of an amendment if the previous question should not be seconded, which is anterior to the notice of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to say to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that I do represent a district "down East," and am proud of it; and in my judgment the constituents of a member from "down East" have the same rights to be heard here as those of the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other district, and I propose while I am here to assert them. In relation to the present occupant of the presidential chair I have stated the popular sentiment of the country, as I understand it. It is one question whether he has discharged the duties of his office acceptably, and quite another question whether with him for a foot-ball this House shall enter upon the game of President-making.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania may wish to do it, but I do not. The practice is well out of vogue ever since the days of Crawford, and I am not inclined to resuscitate it. I am entirely willing to leave that question to the proper convention to be selected in the customary way next year, and I am unwilling by our action here to inaugurate a movement in favor of one aspirant or another; and that is the matter that now underlies in my judgment this most intense agitation on the question of impeachment.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to say a word on this question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield.

Mr. BROMWELL. In my opinion this House cannot console itself with any such reflection as that it can pass this subject over. This matter has gone too far for any House of Representatives to ignore the proceedings of this committee; and, whether it be in October or in January next, this House must sift the evidence, and must take some action either for or against the present incumbent of the presidential chair. The country demands this at our hands, and I know of no district of country in all the regions with which I have any acquaintance that considers this question unworthy the attention of the House. The people have chafed under the delay; they are angered at this hour because the House has not, in their opinion, sufficient energy in inquiring into the merits of this controversy between the people and the acting President. The people are weary with the delay in hunting up specialties and trifles when the grand, glaring fact stares them in the face that the Chief Magistrate has met both the last and the present Congress with the assumption of complete legislative power, exercising every attribute of a despot in this country, while Congress stood still and submitted.

The Thirty-Ninth Congress lingered out its life and never raised its voice in resistance. But the people are not so easy to be entreated, in my opinion, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] seems to think. I cannot conceive to what community in the United States he alludes when he draws the conclusion that the people are going to be satisfied with our ignoring the question of impeachment. They will not do it, sir. We may go on with it now; we may go on with it in October; we may put it off until March; but I tell you that whether we decide one way or the other, the question must be met by this House and be decided. I feel that I can certainly speak for the entire West when I say that they demand this of the House of Representatives of the United States. I know not what has influenced the Committee on the Judiciary or whether they have had sufficient time or not; but the people begin to think, considering the length of time spent in their investigation, it is about time that they should have discovered whether there is anything to be done, and the people demand to know whether they have made such a discovery, and to know it at once. It is no question of President-making. The very first principle, the very life of the Republic, is involved in the question whether there has been an impeachment offense committed by the President or not. It is not a question to be decided in a day. It will take time; but it is to be done and it will be done. The people will demand it. What we want to know is, what is the earliest possible day on which the committee can report upon this question; and let that be the day for the reassembling of this Congress, not for the purpose of impeaching the President, but for the purpose of deciding the question whether there has been any impeachable offense for us to try.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that the duty of Congress is very plain in regard to this matter. For a long time this question of impeachment has been discussed both in Congress and out of it, through the newspapers and by the people. The Committee on the Judiciary have spent months and months in taking testimony in regard to the charges against the President.

Now what is the duty of Congress? What do the people demand? It seems to me that our first duty is to require the Committee on the Judiciary to report the testimony they have already taken to the House that it may be printed, so that members of Congress and the people of the country may form a judgment with regard to its effect. Our next duty is to adjourn until such day in the fall when members shall have had an opportunity of examining the testimony and the people of the country shall have examined it, and we can then come together duly informed as to the facts. It is not so material that the committee should report their own conclusion at this time. We can form our own conclusions from the testimony, and so can the people of the country. The committee can present their conclusion when we assemble again; but in the mean time let the testimony which has been taken be reported to the House and printed, and let us have an opportunity of examining it. I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I have no certain idea whether Mr. Johnson ought to be impeached or not. I have some general ideas, but I do not know what the testimony is. It seems to me, however, that if the committee was going to take any testimony on the question they must have taken it now. I give notice that I will at the proper time offer a resolution requiring the Committee on the Judiciary to report the testimony they have taken.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield now to my colleague on the Judiciary Committee from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution now before the House. I desire simply to enter my protest against the remarks made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] He said, if I understood him correctly, that this proposition for impeachment is simply a scheme for "President-making." Sir, I repudiate that allegation as utterly unfounded and unwarrantable. I say to the gentleman that those who are in favor of impeachment are actuated by as pure motives as those who are opposed to it. I will not say, sir, that the gentleman from Maine is opposed to impeachment in order that he may prevent a particular man from becoming President of the United States; yet I might make that allegation with quite as much truthfulness and with quite as much evidence to sustain it as the allegation which has been made by the gentleman himself.

The gentleman tells us that the people, at least in his part of the country, are not in favor of impeachment. How does he know what will be the opinion of the people in any part of the country when they have seen and read and considered all the testimony upon this subject? Does any gentleman here expect that this question can be staved off, and that there shall be no consideration given to it? It is, as has been properly stated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL,] a question that must be met; and gentlemen may as well prepare to "face the music" now as at any other time.

If the President of the United States shall not be found guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors when the evidence shall be presented against him, then, sir, it is due to this House, to him, and to the country that he should have the verdict of this body upon that question, and have it speedily. If he is guilty the country has a right to know it and to have the constitutional remedy applied.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him; but I believe I cannot yield to him further, as I have promised a few minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Very well, sir; I am sorry that I have not more time; but I yield, of course.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised to hear gentlemen on this floor give their opinion as to what they will do in relation to impeachment. For my part, I am unable to determine what I shall do. As I understand, we have had a committee investigating this subject. The evidence taken before that committee has never been laid before the House; and consequently I do not understand how gentlemen can determine the manner in which they will vote, whether for or against impeachment.

All I desire to say on this subject is that in my judgment the time has come when this question should be brought before the House and the country for action. I do not pretend to say what my action will be in the case. I do not think any one can intelligently tell what his action will be before he has an opportunity to read and examine with care the testimony which has been collected by the committee. But, sir, it must be apparent to this House that the continuation of this subject in its present position before the country tends to paralyze the interests of the nation; and that the question should be determined in one way or the other.

Now, sir, in my judgment the committee has had sufficient time to collect the evidence; and we owe it to ourselves and to the country to require the committee to report at once to this House the testimony they have taken. If the chairman is not prepared with his report upon the testimony, give him time; but the House and the country are entitled to have before them the testimony which has been taken, and for one I am ready and willing to vote that the testimony be presented at once for our consideration and that of the people.

There is no propriety in procrastinating a subject of this kind. If the President has been guilty of that class of offenses with which he has been charged, we owe it to ourselves and to the country to impeach him at once. If he is innocent, that fact should be established that the country may be at rest. I have said that the continued suspense in regard to this question is paralyzing the industrial interests of the country. We feel it all over the great West. We want peace and quiet. We want this disturbing element removed. If the President is guilty, let him be impeached and removed at once. If he be not guilty, then let us so declare.

I know no reason why the committee should take so long a time to investigate this subject. It has, in my judgment, been before them long enough. As I understand, the sittings of the committee have been secret; yet gentlemen come here and announce how they are going to vote on the question of impeachment, although the evidence has not yet been presented. Why, sir, you might as well expect a juror to say on entering the jury-box and before he hears the testimony what will be his verdict on the case he is to try.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that if he desires to move the previous question his hour is just about to expire.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded, there being—ayes 86, noes 84.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend by making it the 11th of November instead of the 16th of October.

A MEMBER. Say the 18th.

Mr. PIKE. It is suggested I should say Wednesday, the 18th of November, instead of the 16th, and I adopt that as a modification of my amendment. I will merely state that I do this irrespective of the impeachment and irrespective of the President-making. If I am mistaken about President-making, gentlemen know their own motives; but I only speak from what I observe and what I suppose to be the case.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to submit an amendment. It is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof, the following:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House are hereby directed, upon the adjournment of their respective Houses, to adjourn the same to the 16th day of October, 1867, at twelve o'clock m., when the roll of each House shall be called, and immediately thereafter the Presiding Officer of each House shall cause the Presiding Officer of the other to be informed whether or not a quorum of its body has appeared, and thereupon if a quorum of the two Houses, respectively, shall not have appeared upon such call of the roll, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall immediately adjourn their respective Houses without day.

Mr. PIKE. I told the gentleman that I would permit him to offer that amendment and then call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order; and my question of order is that it is not competent for this House to entertain any such resolution as that made in the shape of the amendment of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his reasons, and then the Chair will give his decision.

Mr. SCHENCK. That resolution proposes, in the language of the resolution passed before the late recess, that there shall be a meeting ordered, and if less than a quorum appear then the Presiding Officers of the Senate and House of Representatives shall adjourn Congress without day. I thought it a strange resolution, unprecedented, and did not believe it a constitutional one when passed before. Full reflection on the subject, and an examination as to whether I was right or wrong, has thoroughly satisfied me that we have no right to entertain such a resolution.

The Congress of the United States, as such, has certain general powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. Besides that, there is a contingency provided for, that if upon assembling it shall on any occasion find itself without a quorum it shall have a power it would not otherwise possess, and given to it by the Constitution, to adjourn from day to day and compel the attendance of absent members. But this proposition is that Congress shall convene, and if it finds itself without a quorum then the rule which the Constitution applies shall not prevail, and Congress will make for itself a different rule.

Mr. SPALDING rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think I know what will be the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair allows the gentleman to argue his point at full length.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think this House, perhaps a majority of the members, will take a different view of this subject; but, nevertheless, feeling convinced, as I am, that there is reason in what I proposed, I wish to go upon the record as one member who objects to any such extraordinary measure.

Taking this view of the matter I prepared before the meeting of Congress a resolution covering this point in the resolution under which we are now assembled; and I was gratified on the meeting of the Senate to find a distinguished member of that body entering a protest because the matter had struck his mind in the same way. It proved that I was not entirely alone in my opinion. As that resolution embodies the objections I make to this resolution, I will read it. It is as follows:

Resolved, That in order that the resolution under which this House of Representatives and the Fortieth Congress have assembled at the present session may not be drawn into a precedent for the future, it is hereby declared, that although the two Houses may by such concurrent resolution fix the time at which they are to meet after a recess or adjournment, yet it is not competent by such resolution to prescribe in advance to Congress what alone it shall be in their power to do when so assembled.

My objection then, sir, as embodied in that resolution, and as I make it now, is this: Congress has powers prescribed by the Constitution. They are general when Congress finds itself with a quorum in each body composing Congress prepared to do business. There is a special power when that case does not occur, and when each House finds itself without a quorum. How is it when there is not a quorum present? The Constitution then intervenes and makes a rule. When Congress finds itself assembled without a quorum in either branch the Constitution prescribes what it can do, what it may do, what, if it chooses, it must do, but gives no latitude to any other body, or to the body itself, outside of its action when the case occurs, to prescribe in advance that it shall do certain things, and only certain things. I say that the power of Congress, therefore, to take a recess or to adjourn is limited to fixing a time when it shall reassemble; and, when reassembled, the Constitution intervenes, and if there be a quorum present, provides that it may go on and exercise its general powers, but if there be no quorum, that it shall have the specific power to adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members. An attempt, therefore, to prescribe in advance a rule by which you shall disarm the Congress of the United States of its power to legislate, or of its power to compel the attendance of absent members, is to substitute your rule for the Constitution. That is the point of order which I make; and these are my reasons.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] offers a substitute for the pending resolution, which has been read by the Clerk. His colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] makes the point that it is unconstitutional and not in accordance with parliamentary law. The Chair has desired the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to explain and argue his point at length; which he has done with clearness, as he always does. The Chair, differing in toto from the conclusion of the gentleman, overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read the fourth clause of the fifth section of the Constitution.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business. But a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

The SPEAKER. The first part of that clause declares that "each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." This is the broad charter given in the Constitution by which the two Houses transact all their legislative business. It includes, of course, within its range of power the authority to lay down an order of business, to decide when they shall meet, and what business they shall or shall not take up when they do meet. This is the power conferred by the Constitution upon a quorum of each House.

The clause then concludes by giving certain powers to less than a quorum. "A smaller number may adjourn from day to day and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, but in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." They must, therefore, compel the attendance of absent members in such manner as each House (which means a quorum thereof) shall have provided anterior to that time. It follows, the Chair thinks, by the plain reading of the Constitution, that a minority of each House, less than a quorum, cannot have, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] argues, larger power than a majority of each House sitting as a legislative body. If the point of order made is correct, less than a quorum has more power than more than a quorum, an anomaly never recognized by parliamentary law, nor conferred by the Constitution, in the opinion of the Chair. The limitation of the power of less than a quorum is absolute. They may do certain things in such manner and form and under such penalties as each House (which means a majority thereof) shall have previously provided.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order on three grounds: first, that both Houses of Congress at the opening meeting of the first session of this Congress considered this provision of the Constitution when it declared for exactly such an adjournment as is provided for in the pending resolution. That is a parliamentary precedent not questioned at that time, as the Chair understands, by any member in either branch; certainly not appealed from in either branch, but spoken of latterly, when it was supposed there might not be a quorum present on the 3d day of July.

The Chair overrules it for a second reason, which is, that a majority of each House, when there was a quorum present, have determined that when Congress assembled on the 3d of July, if there was not a quorum present the absent members should not be coerced, but that the Presiding Officers of both branches, who were simply the organs and servants of the two Houses to execute their orders, should then adjourn Congress without day, with full notice to every Senator and Representative of what would be the specific order of business on the 3d day of July, and what would be the result if a majority of either House failed to appear on that day.

The Chair overrules it on the third ground, that at the conclusion of long sessions the two Houses have sometimes provided for an adjournment at a specified day and hour, but that after a certain date only formal business, such as the signing of bills, shall be transacted, and at the final adjournment of such first session less than a quorum has been present.

If the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio be correct, then if there were no quorum present at such a time, the absence of a quorum would render null the concurrent resolution of quorums of both the House and the Senate.

Upon these grounds the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Chair will allow me to correct a misapprehension. The Chair will observe that my objection is purely constitutional. While I admit the power of the majority of Congress in either House to fix in advance the order of business, my objection is that they do not undertake to fix the order of business, but to say that no business shall be done. They undertake in advance to prevent Congress from acting at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot argue the question, but must overrule the point of order, and the amendment is therefore pending as a substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, Shall the decision of the Speaker stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As this is a very important question, I will demand the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 14, not voting 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Patne, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Tabor, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—125.

NAYS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Benton, Boutwell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Judd, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Lynch, Schenck, Shanks, Van Aernam, and Thomas Williams—14.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnum, Benjamin, Blaine, Bromwell, Brooks, Cake, Chanler, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Finney, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Laffin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, Mercer, Morrell, Morrissey, Noell, Orth, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Thaddeus Stevens, and Van Wyck—31.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the House.

Mr. PIKE. I now insist on the demand for the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 62, noes 36.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BURR. I desire to ask, for information, whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Chair ruled the amendment to be in order; and the vote of the House upon the appeal settled the question that the amendment was pending.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] to strike out "the 16th day of October" and insert "the 13th day of November." Whether this amendment be agreed to or not the next question will be upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to lay on the table the amendment, for the purpose of moving subsequently that when we adjourn it be sine die.

The SPEAKER. The effect of laying the amendment on the table would be to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the whole subject should be laid on the table, would there not be an adjournment sine die?

The SPEAKER. The two Houses could adopt a resolution fixing a day upon which they would adjourn sine die, or could provide for reassembling on some definite day.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I understand the Chair to decide that, if the whole subject should be laid on the table, a motion providing that when Congress adjourns it will adjourn sine die would be in order.

The SPEAKER. Any proposition providing for an adjournment, either sine die or to a specific time, would be in order as a privileged question.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move, then, that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest to the gentleman, if it be in order, that the effect of the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] would be precisely what he desires—that the House would adjourn sine die.

The motion of Mr. GRISWOLD that the whole subject be laid on the table was not agreed to; there being—ayes 47, noes 74.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PIKE to strike out "the 16th day of October" and insert in lieu thereof "the 13th day of November," there were—ayes 75, noes 52.

Mr. BROMWELL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 50, not voting 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Patne, Peters, Pile, Plants, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, and Windom—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Gravely, Hayes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Julian, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Mercer, O'Neill, Orth, Patne, Peters, Pile, Plants, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, and Windom—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley,

Benjamin, Blaine, Cake, Dodge, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finney, Haight, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Laffin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, Moore, Morrell, Morrissey, Newcomb, Noell, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Thomas, and Van Wyck—26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the substitute of Mr. SPALDING.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I should like to inquire what will be the effect of this resolution in case it should pass. It requires, I believe, eighty-six members to constitute a quorum of this body. In case of the passage of this resolution and the assembling of the House after a recess in pursuance of its terms, if eighty-five should be present and all of them should desire to avail themselves of the constitutional rule to remain and compel the attendance of absent members, would you feel bound to disperse them and send them to their homes, notwithstanding the unanimous wish of the eighty-five to stay?

The SPEAKER. The Chair could only say that he would feel bound to execute the order of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. The order of the House being to send them to their homes! They would then have to go, although the entire eighty-five might desire to stay and compel the attendance of the absentees under the positive provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. SPALDING. I insist on the rule being enforced. No debate is in order, as we are acting under the previous question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 107, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Beaman, Bingham, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Driggs, Ela, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Koontz, Mercer, Paine, Peters, Plants, Ross, Sawyer, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Tabor, Taffe, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Wood, and Woodbridge—107.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Cake, Dodge, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, McCarthy, Morrell, Morrissey, Noell, Pomeroy, Pruyn, and Van Wyck—23.

So Mr. SPALDING's substitute was rejected.

The question then recurred on Mr. BOUTWELL's resolution as amended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the previous question is still pending.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to move an amendment to make it the first Monday of December.

The House divided on Mr. BOUTWELL's resolution as amended; and there were ayes 68, noes 42.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON TREATMENT OF PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the select Committee on the Treatment of Union Prisoners: Mr. SHANKS, Mr. PILE, Mr. HARDING, Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire, and Mr. MUNGREN.

COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER also announced that he had appointed Mr. CHANLER to fill the vacancy on the Committee of Elections caused by the resignation of Mr. NICHOLSON.

MATHEW SOMERS.

On motion of Mr. HALSEY, by unanimous consent leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mathew Somers.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of the Speaker, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. GARFIELD.

REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to guarantee to the several States of the Union a republican form of government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—SYMES VS. TRIMBLE.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That G. G. Symes, contestant of the claim of L. S. Trimble to a seat in this House as the representative of the first district of Kentucky, be permitted to serve an amended or supplementary notice of contest within ten days after the passage of this resolution, and that L. S. Trimble be permitted to serve his answer thereto within thirty days after the service thereof.

Mr. RANDALL. Is this by consent of the two parties?

Mr. PAINE. It is not by the consent of Mr. Trimble, but it is by the consent of the contestant. I have submitted this matter to the chairman of the Committee of Elections; and he has informed me two courses are customary: one is to apply to the House for liberty to serve an amended notice after the expiration of the time, and the other to serve a notice, and then come in at the next session of Congress and ask it to abide by the action of the contestant. It seems to me, however, that inasmuch as the House is now in session it would be but fair that the contestant make his application now. Otherwise the House at the next session might ask him why he did not ask for leave to serve notice before. The chairman of the committee has no objection to this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I move a reference to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. PAINE. I will state, for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the reason why it is necessary to take a course like this is that the time for serving notice under the law has expired some two days ago. But for that it would be competent for the contestant to serve his amended notice without leave of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I merely want to remark that this is a very unusual procedure. The gentleman himself admits that the time has expired, evidently indicating that up to a very recent period and subsequent to the time of the expiration of notice this contestant never dreamed he had any right to contest the seat, or there was no use whatever in attempting it. Now, if I understand it, the objection to the admission of Mr. Trimble is alleged disloyalty. He was elected by some seven thousand majority over the gentleman who now comes forward to contest his seat. Under such circumstances it occurs to me that the question should be considered as originally presented, whether Mr. Trimble is disloyal or not, and not whether Mr. Symes shall contest his seat; because if Mr. Trimble is disloyal then the seat is vacant, Mr. Symes not having given proper notice of contest within the time that the law requires.

Mr. PAINE. I have not heard all the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, but I apprehend from the tenor of what I have heard that he confounds this case with another which has been brought before the House. In this case the notice was being served; and if it is true, as the gentleman has asserted, that this is not the usual procedure, the only reason is this: that heretofore there has been no session of Congress after the election before the session at which the contest was tried, and therefore it has been usual for contestants to first serve the amended notice and then come into the House and ask it to ratify their action; and I believe the House has invariably done so where the action was taken on good grounds. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 64, noes 26, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BLAKELY VS. HISE, (DECEASED.)

Mr. PAINE. I rise to another question of privilege. I offer the following preamble and resolution. The preamble will explain itself:

Whereas George D. Blakely asks for admission to this House as a Representative from the third district of Kentucky, and his competitor, Elijah Hise, having died before the votes were canvassed, and no other person claiming a seat in this House as a Representative of said district, this case is not provided for by any statute of the United States, but is subject to the provisions of the Constitution: Therefore,

Resolved, That in this case transcripts of official records and files, and of extracts therefrom and abstracts thereof, duly certified under seal by the clerks of the several county courts in said district, shall be competent evidence before the Committee of Elections and before this House of the facts therein shown.

I demand the previous question on this resolution, unless the chairman of the Committee of Elections prefers that it should be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will allow it to go to the committee.

Mr. PAINE. I will do so only in case the chairman desires it.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. I do not think this is a privileged question. There is no report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. Everything affecting the right of a member to a seat is a question of privilege, although the House may not see fit to adopt the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. Even if a man comes here and claims a dead man's seat?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot argue the question. This resolution is in regard to the right of the member from the third district of Kentucky to his seat.

Mr. PAINE. This is not a case of contest. There is no one contesting the seat.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. PAINE. It is not, of course, the design of this resolution to admit this claimant to a seat now; but it is to provide the kind of evidence that may be used for the purpose of establishing his claim before the Committee of Elections of this House. The gentleman asks if he is to be admitted without the certificate of the Governor of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Wisconsin has demanded the previous question upon his resolution, and I want to know if it is in order for him to go into the merits of the question involved?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PAINE. No, sir; I did not withdraw it.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 35, noes 49; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WOOD and PAINE to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 36.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise for the purpose of asking information. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin will have an hour in which to discuss this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no such right, because this is not the report of a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I was going to suggest that the gentleman should divide his hour.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BOYER. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the preamble and resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 33, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Elia, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Unson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Kerr, Ketcham, Marshall, McClurg, Morgan, Mungen, Nicholson, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgroves, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, and Wood—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnum, Blaine, Buckland, Butler, Caho, Dixon, Dodge, Eekley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Griswold, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jenckes, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Niblack, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Smith, Thomas, Twichell, Van Wyck, and Stephen F. Wilson—46.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

HONORABLE DISCHARGES OF SOLDIERS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 108) entitled "An act for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated;" on which Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to make some verbal amendments to the first section of the bill. The first is to correct a typographical error by striking out "on" in line six and inserting in lieu thereof "until." I desire, also, to strike out the words "after said surrender" at the end of the section, and insert in lieu thereof the words "or refused to serve after said date." Thus amended the first section will read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no soldier or sailor shall be taken or held to be a deserter from the Army or Navy who voluntarily enlisted to serve and who did faithfully serve the prescribed period of his enlistment until the 19th of April, 1865, and who, without proper authority or leave first obtained, did quit his command or refused to serve after said date.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, these amendments will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment proposed yesterday by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB:] and I presume it will be adopted by unanimous consent. I ask the Clerk to read that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section two insert after the words "mustered out" the words "or who was killed in battle or died before the expiration of his term of service;" so that the section will read as follows:

That any volunteer soldier or sailor who may at any time have absented himself from the service, and who voluntarily returned to duty and remained with his proper command until it was regularly mustered out, or who was killed in battle, or died before the expiration of his term of service, shall not be classed as a deserter.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as adopted. There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will state, also, that I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAUM] provided it be modified by inserting after the word "act" the words "for such alleged desertion or such refusal to serve, and whose pay was forfeited therefor." With this modification the additional section which the gentleman proposes will read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all dishonorable discharges given to any soldier or sailor included within the provisions of this act for such alleged desertion or such refusal to serve, and whose pay was forfeited therefor, are hereby vacated and set aside, and such soldiers and sailors shall be entitled to discharges and pay as other soldiers and sailors under this act.

The SPEAKER. This amendment, as modified, will be regarded as adopted; if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am willing, also, that the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] shall be adopted. It is to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That when any soldier or sailor of the late war, whose name is borne on the rolls of the Army or Navy as a deserter, shall present to the Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy satisfactory proof that such desertion was only technical, and without intention to abandon the service, the Secretary is hereby authorized and directed to give such soldier or sailor a certificate that his record of desertion has been canceled.

The SPEAKER. This amendment, also, will be regarded as adopted, unless there be objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING,] I believe, consents to withdraw his amendment, the substance of it having been inserted in the bill.

Mr. HARDING. Yes, sir; I withdraw it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman will permit the reading of an amendment which I have prepared and would like to offer.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly; I will permit it to be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say that my amendment may not be regarded as strictly germane to the bill; but it is a proposition which I think will appeal to the sense of justice of every gentleman here. It is to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the widow, minor children, or parents, in the order named, of any soldier who shall have died after being honorably discharged from the military service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the additional bounty to which such soldier would be entitled, if living, under the provisions of the twelfth and thirteenth sections of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866, and the said sections of said act shall be so construed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Ohio will not object to let this amendment come before the House. It is to cure a manifest defect in the act of the 23d of July, 1866. It was not the intention of Congress to deprive the widows and minor children of this bounty when the soldier had died after honorable discharge from service; but the construction placed upon it is this: that the soldier, if living, would receive the bounty, but that if he died after his discharge from service his widow and minor children would be entitled to it. I would not ask to submit the amendment if it were not on a subject about which there can be no difference of opinion. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will let it come before the House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. While I believe that the object sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from Indiana is one that commends itself to the House, still I think that it should be provided in a bill by itself. I do not think that it should be attached to this proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not entirely without pertinency to this bill. It harmonizes with some provisions of the bill. It is to cure a manifest defect in the act of July, 1866.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot accept the amendment, although I will vote for it in a separate bill with great cheerfulness.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to say one word further. It is manifest unless this amendment comes before us now this evil will not be removed during this session. I therefore ask again that the amendment may be permitted to come before the House.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill would have to be changed.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a defect that ought to be remedied, because as the construction now is an injury is done to a very meritorious class of people.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will say that I introduced a bill on this subject after careful consideration, but as my colleague's bill has the precedence I have gone over it with him, and find by various modifications made to it that it now embodies all I thought proper to bring before this House on this subject, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DECLINE OF THE SHIP-BUILDING INTEREST.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the causes of the decline of the ship-building interest in America, and how far such depreciation is attributable to congressional enactment, and how far it may be remedied by legislation, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. - I ask leave to make a few words of explanation, and to send up a letter of Professor Agassiz.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, for some time an article has been going the rounds of the newspapers professing to give a theory of races by Professor Agassiz. It has assumed so much importance that on Monday last it was read by a member of this House from the State of Ohio (Mr. MUNCY) as a portion of his speech. On that very day (the 8th of July) Professor Agassiz wrote a letter, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read, together with the extract. I find on comparing the extract with that in the gentleman's able speech that they are exactly alike.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAHANT, July 8, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I have already seen the newspaper slip you inclose to me, and would like to know how a public teacher can protect himself from such villainous calumnies. I would be ashamed to entertain the vile sentiments expressed in those lines, and to use the vulgar language in which they are couched. I trust my printed views will protect me from such defamation. At all events, I do not feel called upon to waste my time in answering newspaper paragraphs. The only ground I may have given to question the soundness of my views concerning the different races of men is the opinion I have always maintained, and which I still hold now, that the different types of the human family have an independent origin one from the other, and are not descended from common ancestors; but this idea I do not apply to the negroes only, but to the Indians, the Chinese, the Indoos, the Australians, &c., as well. In fact, I believe that men were created in nations, not in individuals; but not in nations in the present sense of the word; on the contrary, in such crowds as exhibited slight, if any, diversity among themselves, except those of sex.

The statements in the paragraph sent, concerning the bones of negroes and their blood, &c., are absolutely false, and no anatomist nor chemist ever uttered such absurdities. But I have no time to publish in parcels of a few lines a text-book of anatomy and physiology for the use of penny-a-liners. Moreover, I never touched upon those special topics in any of my public lectures.

Ever truly yours,

H. AGASSIZ.

Hon. H. WILSON, U. S. Senator.

"I have pointed out over a hundred specific differences between the bonal and nervous system of the white man and negro. Indeed, their frames are alike in no particular. There is not a bone in the negro's body that is relatively the same shape, size, articulation, or chemically of the same composition as that of the white man. The negro's bones contain a far greater percentage of calcareous salts than those of the white man. Even the negro's blood is chemically a very different fluid from that which courses in the veins of the white man. The whole physical organization of the negro differs quite as much from the white man's as it does from that of the chimpanzee—that is, in his bones, muscles, nerves, and fibres. The chimpanzee has not much further to progress to become a negro than a negro has to become a white man. This fact science inexorably demonstrates."

* * * * "Climate has no more to do with the difference between the white man and negro than it has with that between the negro and the chimpanzee, or than it has between the horse and the ass, or the eagle and the owl. Each is a distinct and separate creation. The negro and the white man were created as specifically different as the owl and the eagle. They were designed to fill different places in the system of nature. The negro is no more a negro by accident or misfortune than the owl is the kind of bird he is by accident or misfortune. The negro is no more the white man's brother than the owl is the sister of the eagle, or than the ass is the brother of the horse. How stupendous, and yet how simple, is the doctrine that the Almighty Maker of the universe has created different species of men, just as he has different species of the lower animals, to fill different places and offices in the grand system of nature!"

Mr. SCOTFIELD. At the time of writing that letter the professor was not aware that these same sentiments were being read in the House of Representatives, and I put his letter upon the record because that extract was also upon the record, so that all may see what the professor himself says about it, and also that my friend from Ohio and all who have been influenced by the false sentiments attributed to him may see that they are not upheld by any theory of races originating with or indorsed by that eminent scholar, in their persistent persecution and oppression of four million southerners, to whom that section is mainly indebted for all its material prosperity.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution and documents relative to the impeachment of the President, be directed to report the evidence at this session, with leave to make further report if they shall deem proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that when the committees are called for reports that can be done. The first thing in order would be the calling of the committees for reports.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know as to that.

The SPEAKER. They cannot be compelled to report until they are regularly called.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is not the Committee on the Judiciary authorized to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is; but it is the privilege of the committee not to do it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I simply want to pass a resolution conformable to the rule.

The SPEAKER. The call of the committees will be made whenever any member demands the regular order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not want to interfere with the call. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not intend to indulge in any discussion which might lead to angry feelings between ourselves.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman will hear my statement he may then either insist upon the previous question or not.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman wants to make any remarks that will not interfere with my object, which is to get along quietly—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not intend anything else.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then I will allow the gentleman to make his statement.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that instead of the resolution in its present form he modify it so as to give authority to the committee to cause to be printed the usual number of copies of the evidence that has been taken in order that it may be laid on the table of members on the first day of the next session. I only wish to state the reason for it; the gentleman can accept the modification or not. It is this: that if the evidence is printed now it goes to the country for discussion before the House is ready to take it up for consideration. That is all I have to say.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that the report of the evidence may be printed under the supervision of the committee.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Well, sir, I will let it stand as it is, and demand the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is not seconded it will then be in order, I believe, for me to move that authority be given to the committee to do that which I desire.

The SPEAKER. Any motion will then be in order.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 50, noes 56.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH, and WILSON of Iowa.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 68.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move, as a substitute for the resolution, the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to have the usual number of copies of the evidence by said committee relative to the impeachment of the President printed and laid on the desks of members of the House on the first day of the next session of Congress, whether adjourned or regular.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether he contemplates the testimony being all kept secret, not to be seen until the day of our assembling again, and then to be laid on our tables.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Of course the object of the resolution is to keep the testimony where it is until it is reported to the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I decline.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman permit an amendment by substituting Monday next?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have insisted on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know what is the usual number of copies?

Mr. PIKE. Fifteen hundred and fifty.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 57, noes 44.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I must ask the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 48, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beaman, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferriss, Perry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hamilton, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Ketcham, Kithen, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Louhrig, Marshall, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Platts, Poland, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Twichell, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Benjamin, Brownell, Broomall, Burr, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Finney, Getz, Gravelly, Harding, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Logan, Logan, Lynch, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morgan, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Polesie, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Trowbridge, Unson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Thomas Williams, and William Williams—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Cake, Dodge, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Griswold, Halsey, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ladin, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrell, Morrissey, Neill, Pile, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Aaron F. Stevens, Thomas, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and John T. Wilson—37.

So the main question was ordered.

The Speaker stated the first question to be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. After the vote which has been taken upon this resolution, indicating the views of the majority of the House in regard to it, I am willing to abandon it. I therefore move that the resolution as amended be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. ROBINSON asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee of nine members, to be known as the Committee on Internal Revenue, be appointed as the other standing committees of this House are appointed, to which shall be referred all such matters as pertain to the internal revenue department of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection at all to that reference.

Mr. GARFIELD's motion was agreed to; and the resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Rules.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES. I offer as a question of privilege the following resolution, upon which I ask the previous question:

Resolved, That in the investigation ordered by this House in the several election cases from Kentucky, referred to the Committee of Elections for investigation by the House on the 8th instant, and also in the investigation ordered by the House into certain charges against William H. Barnum, member from the fourth congressional district of Connecticut, the Committee of Elections be, and hereby are, authorized to sit during the recess at such times and places, and to pursue such investigation, by such numbers of the committee as they shall determine.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, what he means by the expression "such numbers of the committee?"

Mr. DAWES. I mean to authorize the committee to hold sessions at the same time in different places, to permit, for instance, a portion of the committee to pursue the investigation in regard to the Kentucky elections, while another portion of it investigates this case of Barnum, in the State of Connecticut, that has been referred to us.

Mr. BROOKS. I made the inquiry because I think a very bad habit is growing up in this investigation, where one member of the committee sits as the committee, being intrusted with all the powers of the committee, and exercising all the powers belonging to the whole committee.

Mr. DAWES. It is not intended by the resolution to authorize a portion of the committee to take any final action, but simply to take testimony. If a portion of the committee be allowed to take testimony in Kentucky, and another portion in Connecticut, the proceeding will be attended with much less expense than if the members from Illinois and Ohio should be compelled to go to Connecticut, and the members from Massachusetts and Vermont to go to Kentucky.

Mr. BROOKS. When a committee sits there should always be a quorum of the committee in attendance, because a committee has very large powers, and there should be, too, a representation of the minority of the committee.

Mr. DAWES. This resolution simply makes a portion of the committee commissioners to take testimony.

Mr. BROOKS. But a commissioner has very large powers—to accept or reject evidence, to examine or not to examine witnesses. This resolution would in effect constitute one man a committee on the organization of the House.

Mr. DAWES. It is supposed that each portion of the committee will take all the testimony and examine all the witnesses that anybody desires to bring before them. The object is to save the expense and the time which must otherwise be consumed. It does not seem to me worth while to require the nine members of the committee to go from one extreme of the country to the other. This taking of testimony amounts to nothing more than what a commissioner might do in taking depositions. I think that the gentleman from New York will not find in this proceeding anything that will endanger the rights of any gentleman. Certainly there is no such design.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand the explanations of the gentleman; but the result of this method of proceeding is that the Government, by occupying the time of its committees and its reporters, and by expenditures for travel, incurs the expense which hitherto, under the law, has fallen upon contestants of elections, in the payment of commissioners, &c.

Mr. DAWES. This does not apply to the contested cases; nor does it apply to the questions raised in any contest.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not the Connecticut case a case of contest?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; it is a case where charges of improper conduct during the election canvass are made against a member, and it does not appear to me that either the sitting member or those who make the charges should pay the expense of the investigation.

I am quite sure that the members of the committee would prefer to postpone this investigation until the House shall again be in session, so that we might sit here in the Capitol and hear this testimony. But in that case every witness must be brought from Kentucky or from Connecticut. This resolution is offered simply with the design of avoiding expense, and for no other purpose. Certainly no final action can be had upon any testimony taken except by the full committee. I trust that this explanation is satisfactory to the gentleman.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask unanimous consent to say a few words in reply to the letter presented this morning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD,] and the remarks with which he accompanied it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, in the letter from Professor Agassiz, presented this morning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I find indorsed the doctrine which I hold with regard to the plurality of races. Upon this point I would like to ask the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he believes in the theory of Professor Agassiz upon this subject. I hope the gentleman will answer the question, yes or no. Does the gentleman believe in the theory in which I believe, and in which Professor Agassiz believes; as to the plurality of races?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I did not suppose that any opinions I might hold as to the origin or number of races would be of any account either to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MUNGEN] or any other member of this House. I supposed that the gentleman would be contented with the opinion of so distinguished a scholar as he whose letter I have had the honor to present here to-day, and would not expect me or perhaps any other member of this House to enter into a controversy with that learned man upon this subject. I believe, never having investigated this subject myself, that the report presented by Professor Agassiz is unquestionably correct. I believe that the views and sentiments inculcated in the extract presented here the other day by the gentleman from Ohio are, as Professor Agassiz characterized them, "vile calumnies." Of course I do not say that they were so designed by the gentleman from Ohio; but they are "vile calumnies" upon the sentiments which this learned scholar has presented to the world. I make no issue with the letter, but I do take issue with the extract presented. I am sure that the gentleman would present none that he considered as a forgery. I understood him the other day to present these views as justifying the oppression of the black race, and of withholding from them the privileges which belong to our common humanity, and for forcing them back to the original bondage in which he and his political friends have endeavored to hold them.

Mr. MUNGEN. The gentleman has not yet answered my question. I cannot tell whether he believes in the plurality of the human races or not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman did not listen to me. I say that I have not investigated the subject, and do not pretend to form an opinion in reference to the letter of Professor Agassiz; but, sir, I do differ in toto with the gentleman's speech, which the letter characterizes, so far as the extract quoted is concerned, as a "vile calumny."

Mr. MUNGEN. The professor has not read my speech. [Laughter.] In his letter he does not differ with me in reference to the plurality of races; he agrees with me. I was never a pro-slavery man in my life. I am glad that slavery is abolished, but I did not like the way in which it was done, [laughter;] and that, although I helped to do it. When I say I did not like the manner in which it was done I mean in respect to its costing us a million of lives.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If I understand the gentleman, he considers the question of ethnology as a question of politics. I have heard learned disquisitions on the other side of the House on that subject, and I confess that they afford me—

Mr. MUNGEN. What is the question? I yielded for a question, and not for a speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean by his question that there are types of the human race which are unfit for self-government? And in that connection there is another question.

Mr. MUNGEN. One at a time. I will answer the first question before you put another. If the gentleman had read my speech he would not have had any necessity to ask me the question. It is clear and distinct on that subject. I believe, and have so asserted, that there are many races which are unfit for self-government.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask another question. I do not make any issue on that. I do not know but we may ultimately agree on that point. I ask him whether he knows any example in the history of any race of men, except the Teutonic branch of what the gentleman from New York is pleased to term the great Caucasian family, which has ever successfully maintained or established free government? I ask him whether he knows of any case where the Celtic race, which is the backbone of the Democratic party in the United States, has ever established a free government? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON rose.

Mr. MUNGEN. I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I want to know whether the differences in the white races are not equal to the differences between the white and black races?

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to know whether the gentleman addresses me on that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I am putting the question to the gentleman from Ohio on his ethnological point.

Mr. MUNGEN. The gentleman is not very clear in his ideas of race. If he had read my speech he would have found that I have answered every proposition that he has advanced. He as well as other members will find it good reading. [Laughter.]

In answer to his question I will say that I do not believe the differences between the white races are equal to the differences between the white and black race. But, sir, I did not rise to go into any general discussion of this matter.

I want to say to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] that I found the extract I quoted going the rounds of the papers, and uncontradicted for months, and that it is in consonance with the public lectures of Professor Agassiz in the city of New York. I think that the professor has got a little thinned recently. He is up in a latitude in Boston where it will not do to hold the same views he held in his New York speech. Perhaps he will take back what he said in the Smithsonian Institution. It is apparent to every gentleman who read the extract and who heard the letter read in this House to-day that there is no difference whatever between Professor Agassiz and myself in reference to the plurality of races.

I have no fault to find with him. I simply say this, that the proposition I argued was whether such a bill as that, and the acts to which it was supplementary and explanatory, were beneficial to this Government or just to the white race. I argued the question as courteously as I could, avoiding the question of theology, which naturally does belong to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. MUNGEN. No, sir; I will not give any more for stump speeches. [Laughter.] So far as that is concerned I am willing to give to Professor Agassiz the benefit of his disclaimer; but I appeal to those who heard that letter read whether he does not distinctly say that there are distinct races, and whether that letter does not fully indorse the remarks I made the other day as published in the Globe? I maintain that it does.

And I say another thing: that so far as the nerves and bones are concerned the learned and accomplished Dr. Knox takes the very same ground. He says in a case he examined of a black man that the nerves were one third less than in the Saxon of the same size and weight. Dr. Knox stands to-day undisputed on that point, either in Europe or America. Pritchard, who wrote largely on the subject, and took a different ground in the first two volumes, turns round in the third volume and virtually comes to the same conclusion that Francis Pulszky, Habersham, Nott, and Glendon have come. There is no man who thoroughly studies the physical sciences and can draw proper deductions from the premises who, in my opinion, can resist the truth of what Professor Agassiz states in regard to the great difference between races.

I have said this much in regard to the extract which I found in the paper and put into my speech together with other references. I have not misquoted Professor Agassiz, except that he says he did not speak about the bones, &c. He talks about the style of the language in that article. For that I am not accountable. But so far as the extract is concerned, I must say I believe as a literary production it compares tolerably favorable with the rough words contained in that letter. I suppose he was in a rather bad humor when he wrote it. I am sorry.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask my friend, whom I may call the learned anatomist, [laughter]—

Mr. MUNGEN. Not at all.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to ask him whether the Doctor Nott to whom he appeals is not an Alabama slaveholder?

Mr. MUNGEN. It was Doctor Knox that I alluded to. He never was in this country at all that I know of; he is an English lecturer.

TREATMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. MUNGEN. While I have the floor I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee heretofore appointed to inquire of the treatment of prisoners, &c., be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report upon the treatment, &c., of prisoners confined in the camps and prisons of the United States Government during the war; and also to inquire into and report upon the facts connected with the cartel as to exchange of prisoners, and the action under the same by the officers of the United States and the so-called confederate government, and why the speedy exchange of prisoners was not effected.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I object.

RECESS TO-DAY.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess till eight o'clock, and I ask unanimous consent to give the reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the Senate are considering the bill for reconstruction sent to them by this House, and they have notified members of the House that probably they will be able to send it back to the House at eight o'clock. In order to expedite the business I make this motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not believe it is advisable.

Mr. JUDD. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, the House refused to adjourn—ayes 42, noes 72.

The question then recurred on the motion to take a recess till eight o'clock, and it was agreed to.

Accordingly the House (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess till eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at eight o'clock p. m.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 10, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House what further legislation, if any, is necessary to facilitate the payment of additional bounty granted by act of July 28, 1866.

In reply I would say that as far as this Department is concerned no further legislation is required to facilitate the payment of the bounty in question.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

HUGH McCULLOCH.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill in reference to bounties to the widows and heirs of soldiers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask leave to introduce my bill, and to have it printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that a bill in regard to reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. It is not in regard to reconstruction, but the gentleman from Indiana was upon the floor at the time the message came in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desired to move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce a bill in regard to bounties, but I am willing to waive it until this reconstruction bill is disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is the bill from the Senate to be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction?

Mr. BOUTWELL. This is substantially the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the reading of the bill.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the true intent and meaning of the "Act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, A. D. 1867, was, is, and shall be construed to be that the military authority of the United States in said rebel States, as provided in said act, was and is paramount to any civil government existing therein, makes all such civil governments subordinate to such military authority, and prohibits them from interfering in any way with the exercise of such military authority.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commander of any district named in said act shall have power, subject to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said act shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from, or granted by, or claimed under any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof; and upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the approval of the General aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment of some other person to perform the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the General of the Army of the United States shall be invested with all the powers of suspension, removal, and detail granted in the preceding section to district commanders.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers and appointing others in their stead are hereby confirmed. Provided, that any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district, or by the General of the Army.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the boards of registration provided for in the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,'" passed March 2, 1867, shall have power, and it shall be their duty before allowing the registration of any person, to ascertain, upon such facts or information as they can obtain, whether such person is entitled to be registered under said act, and the oath required by said act shall not be conclusive on such question; and no person shall be registered unless such board shall decide that he is entitled thereto; and such board shall also have power to examine under oath (to be administered by any member of such board) any one touching the qualification of any person claiming registration. But in every case of refusal by the board to register an applicant, and in every case of striking his name from the list as hereinafter provided, the board shall make a note or memorandum, which shall be returned with the registration list to the commanding general of the district, setting forth the grounds of such refusal or such striking from the list: Provided, That no person shall be disqualified as member of any board of registration by reason of race or color.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary act is (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and whether he was holding such office at the time of the rebellion or had held it before, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote; and the word "executive or judicial officer in any State" in said oath mentioned shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of the general laws of a State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the time for completing the original registration provided for in said act may, in the discretion of the commander of any district, be extended to the 1st day of October, 1867; and the boards of registration shall have power, and it shall be their duty, commencing twenty days prior to any election under said act, and upon reasonable public notice of the time and place thereof, to revise, for a period of five days, the registration lists, and upon being satisfied that any person not entitled thereto has been registered, to strike the name of such person from the list, and such person shall not be allowed to vote. And such board shall also, during the same period, add to such registry the names of all persons who at that time possess the qualifications required by said act who have not been already registered; and no person shall at any time be entitled to be registered or to vote by reason of any executive pardon or amnesty for any act or thing which, without such pardon or amnesty, would disqualify him from registration or voting.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section four of said last named act shall be construed to authorize the commanding general named therein, whenever he shall deem it needful, to remove any member of a board of registration and to appoint another in his stead, and to fill any vacancy in such board.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of this act and of the acts to which this is supplementary shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will state that there has been no session of the committee in reference to this question, and I am not prepared to say whether the majority of that committee are of the opinion that it is wise for the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate or not. I see now that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the committee, is present. With his permission I will state that before the meeting of the House this evening, it happened that four members of the Committee on Reconstruction were present in the committee room and they considered the amendment proposed by the Senate, and they were of the opinion, of course upon a very hasty examination, that this bill is as acceptable as the one that went from the House. Of course these proceedings of the committee are of no practical or parliamentary value; and the motion which I make is made in the belief that probably the House is ready to concur in what seemed to be the judgment of the members of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no feeling in this matter. I am somewhat unwell, and I do not wish to trespass on the patience of the House, but I have not heard exactly what has been done.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senate have passed an entirely new bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no disposition to complain of this hasty legislation, but I would like to hear what the bill is which the Senate has passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a member of the committee, that I desired to consult with him on this subject, but we understood from the clerk of the committee that he was too unwell to be present. Now, being here to answer for himself, after he has heard this bill read he will discover one thing. I have read it carefully myself. The Senate has retained in the bill as amended substantially every provision which went from this House to the Senate, save and except the penal section, which the gentleman will remember.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am not complaining that anything was done in my absence. It is competent to get along as well without as with me. But it seems there is to be unusual haste. If there is nothing in the bill that is altered that is another thing. This committee having considered the matter and reported the bill which was sent to the Senate, I do think it is only proper that the amendment of the Senate should be referred to it for its consideration. I do not wish to be captious, I do not wish to find any fault; but it is for the House to determine.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to state in addition to what has been stated by my colleague on the committee, that I obtained a copy of this bill from the Senate as it passed that body, and came over about twenty minutes before the meeting of the House. The Clerk of the House informed me that he had sent a messenger to the room of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and that the messenger had returned with the message that he probably would not be here this evening. We held only an informal meeting of such members of the committee as could be found. We believed it was a good bill. It is substantially about the same as the House bill.

I am in no haste and do not think there is any necessity for any haste. If it be more acceptable to the House to have the amendment referred to the committee it will be acceptable to me. Many members are anxious that we should pass the bill to-night, so as to facilitate and hurry up the adjournment of Congress; and in that impatience I sympathize. But I do not desire to so hurry up our business as to leave anything undone which ought to be done. If it is the desire of the chairman of the committee that it should be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. They have made some alterations in regard to the General of the Army which I regard as essential.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They do not incorporate our section in regard to the removal of the commanding general. They are silent.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Let us meet at ten o'clock to-morrow, and we can come into the House and recommend what should be done. I hope that course will be adopted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope that course will be adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ascertain, if there be no impropriety in knowing, what is in this bill before we pass upon it from some of these three or four gentlemen who had some twenty or thirty minutes to bestow upon it, whether it is by design that the General of the Army is to have no power to appoint civilians?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is in this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Probably it was intended to be, but like a good many other things it is not there.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is there.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg your pardon. It gives to the district commanders power to suspend or remove or detail officers or appoint other persons. Another section gives to the General-in-Chief power to suspend, remove, or detail. I suspect it was intended to give him the same power as is given to the district commanders, but we are in such great haste that perhaps it is improper to suggest that any such thing has been left out. I ask that the second section be read.

The Clerk read the second section of the Senate bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a section giving power to the district commanders, that they may detail some officer or soldier, or appoint some other person. Then the third section provides that the General of the Army of the United States shall have the power of removal, suspension, and detail granted in the preceding section to the district commanders, but it does not grant him the power to appoint civilians. So the General of the Army has less power.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman consider that of any serious importance?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is no such thing.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am in the expectation of receiving a flat contradiction of that kind. There are some people in this world who know everything, and we must of course always differ with due submission from them. But I say that if it be thought that there are any officers and soldiers unfit to fill these offices when removals take place, and therefore the details will not answer, but they must resort always to the appointment of other persons, there is the same propriety in giving that appointment to the generals as to the subordinates. And more than that, I have information from a Senator that it was an omission in not putting the amendment in the third section; that it was intended to put it in that section as well as the second. I give this as but an instance of what I believe has been overlooked. It struck me when I heard it read by the Clerk—and that is all the information I have—that that amendment, which was very properly made in the second section in the Senate bill, was in all probability intended to be inserted in the other section.

I hope this bill will be referred to the committee and printed. I hope we shall at least have the opportunity of seeing what those amendments are, whether material or immaterial. When we remember that a great deal of the difficulty with regard to the construction of the law as it now exists has arisen out of hair-splitting in reference to particular forms of phraseology contained in amendments put into the bill during its progress through the House it may not be improper to take a little warning by that, and see whether we cannot use such exactness of language and be so specific that we may have it in every way more to our purpose, even if we take a few hours more to wait, consider, reflect, and act, with a view to this object.

Now, sir, I am inclined to think the bill as it comes from the Senate is very much better than the House bill, and if I am forced to vote now, without further examination, I would at once vote with those who are for agreeing to this substitute of the Senate. I do not like either of the bills. I do not mean to detain the House with an argument, but I have not troubled them in relation to this bill from the beginning, and I desire to say that if I had had control of this matter—and so far as my vote would go I would at any time desire to give it in that direction—I would have swept away entirely all those pretended civil governments at the South and built up new ones from the foundation. I do not think anything else is a complete remedy for the state of things.

But the removal of obstacles does not appear to be the order here now. When an obstruction in the shape of a President lies in my path toward the accomplishment of that which ought to be our object, namely, the building up of civil governments in the southern States, I would not, so far as that obstruction is concerned, either attempt to dig canals around it, burrow under it, or climb over it, but remove it out of the way. And as I would remove the obstruction in the shape of an officer or person, so I would do in reference to a kindred principle, and remove these civil governments.

I do not know that the committee will take any different view of it from what they have heretofore taken, nor that we can expect any such amendment as that proposed to the amendment of the Senate; but I do think we might at least wait. And I am more inclined to think—to return to the point with which I set out—that when you come to examine the matter, it will be found that there was an omission in inserting the amendment I have alluded to by the Senate, and that they intended to make the amendment in the third section.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think there is anything in the point the gentleman makes with reference to the section which gives to the commanding General of the Army the power of detail and removal. The preceding section expressly gives to the commanding general of the district the power to appoint other persons; and another section gives to the commanding General the power to make detail, the same power that commanders of the district have.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not at all.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. To make detail and removal; but it does not take from the commanding general of the district the power to appoint other persons at all. It may be well to put into that section the same phraseology as in the other—to appoint other persons; but I do not think it will have any particular significance nor make the bill any stronger or any less strong; for it is scarcely to be presumed that the commanding General of the Army is going to examine into these matters and appoint justices of the peace, judges of probate, sheriffs, constables, &c. I think it would perhaps be best that the bill should be recommitteed and printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] It is in regard to the construction of the fourth section of this bill. It provides as follows:

That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers and appointing others in their stead are hereby confirmed.

Now, I wish to inquire whether under this bill officers may be displaced and others put in their stead for any acts done prior to the passage of this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I so understand; and I beg leave to say to the gentleman that the legal effect of the first section of this bill is, to all intents and purposes, precisely the same, according to my recollection, as that of the bill which we sent to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point to which I am directing my remarks. My own view about the matter is that by the confirmation of the acts of the commanding general these officers will hold their positions, unless they do some act hereafter for which they can be removed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Senate has amended the fourth section.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir; the Senate added these words:

Provided, That any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; these persons may be removed in the same manner as any other officer. But the point which I wish to suggest is this: that by the confirming of the appointment, they must be removed hereafter for acts done subsequent to the passage of this bill. Now, I desire to ask whether, if the bill should go to the committee, it would not be well that the committee should add an amendment providing that these appointments already made shall be subject to the approval of the commanding general in the same manner as appointments to be made hereafter. Without going into any argument about the question, I think there have been appointed to office some persons whose appointments would not be deemed proper by this House. Hence I think the amendment I have suggested would be proper. Certainly, it seems to me, there can be no objection to it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into a discussion on that point.

Mr. LOGAN. Neither do I desire to discuss it. I merely made the suggestion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the distinction which the gentleman has drawn, and it may be a proper distinction; but I will only say in reply, that the terms of the act ex vi termini import that the appointments are valid.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. We are not able to hear on this side of the House the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and I insist that he shall speak from his own seat. He belongs over here with us, and he ought to be here. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin insists on the point, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] must speak from his own seat or from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish the gentleman to go back to wallowing in the mire. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin insists on his point, and therefore the gentleman from Ohio must speak from his own seat or from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Wisconsin is in fun.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken. His experience may lead him to think that it is all fun. He may have been in fun in his remarks when he was over here. But we are deeply in earnest. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that unless there be urged against this bill some stronger objection than any that we have yet heard I do not see why the House should spend any further time upon it.

Mr. SPALDING. Is there any restriction on the right of removal of these military commanders?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. What I desire to say is this: that all of these military commanders are under the supervision of the General of the Army. I am willing to admit that my colleague is doubtless right that the Senate intended to put it in, but with all regard to him I must be permitted to say that I believe it to be a work of supererogation.

Mr. SCHENCK. When this bill was first reported it had two sections, the second and the third, in relation to this matter. By the second they gave power to the district commanders to suspend or remove and detail officers or soldiers to fill any vacancies thus occasioned. They afterward amended the bill in the second section so as to provide that the district commanders should not only have the power to fill these vacancies by detailing officers or soldiers, but for very good reason the Senate went further and provided that the offices might be filled by the appointment of any other persons, that is, by civilians. We all know that there are not officers enough to fill these places. But they have omitted in the third section to make the same provision in regard to the General of the Army. As originally reported, the language of the third section followed that of the second. They altered the second but did not alter the third. It stands now that the district commanders may suspend or remove, detail or appoint some other person, but the General of the Army can only suspend or remove and detail. The district commander may remove a Governor of a State and appoint some civilian to take his place or detail some officer to do it. The General may remove the Governor of a State and detail an officer or soldier to take his place, but he cannot appoint any one else. I do not believe it was the intention of the Senate, and I am well advised when I say that it was an oversight to give the General of the Army less power than the district commanders. I say that this discrepancy struck me when I heard it read, and if one flaw, if it be one, can be discovered on the reading of the manuscript of the bill as it comes from the Senate, when we come to have it in print as it passed the Senate it seems to me it is not at all impossible that some other inaccuracy may be found out, or that some other amendment may be made.

I do not know that I should dwell upon this but for the fact that it is considered little short of treason for any one to speak of amending, or seeking or claiming the right to deliberate upon or look at the language of this bill before it is passed. The gentleman says there was plenty of time given in the House on this bill. It does not occur to my recollection that any great time was given on that bill; perhaps an hour, with speeches of five or ten minutes in length. I am not making complaint. I did have five minutes allowed me on the original bill upon which Mr. Stanbery has commented. No other time have I taken, and I feel a malicious satisfaction in taking a little time now; doing that for the purpose of saying it would do no harm at least to sleep on this Senate bill. It would do no harm, sir, to see it in print. It would do no harm to so have the language that it would be expressed with precision, and not taken now hurriedly upon the judgment of some three or four members who have had twenty or thirty minutes to bestow upon it. We ask, sir, that the bill shall not only be recommitted, but ordered to be printed, and we can then adjourn and take it up to-morrow.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I have heard amounts to this: that if the word "appointment" is inserted before the word "and" in the third section it would meet my colleague's objections.

Mr. SCHENCK. As far as that goes, I have other very serious objections.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot see why a General of the Army who is allowed to detail from the whole Army cannot be authorized to go outside of it and detail from the whole people of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am appealed to by my friend from Massachusetts to allow him three minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill. It is the most important legislative action, taken with the acts to which it is supplementary, that has been had since the Constitution of the United States was framed. And yet we propose without having read it, without seeing it in print, without having examined it so far as we would examine a private corporation act, to proceed to pass the bill. I pray gentlemen to pause, because this bill is to be made so as to exclude a conclusion that we have twice passed this kind of act and the Attorney General of the United States has found very weighty objections to it, in which judgment he is sustained by some of the ablest lawyers of the country, all in consequence of our haste. We are now passing a bill which will be revised by him, and to which the President of the United States, in the language of one of his generals, is in bitter political antagonism.

Under these circumstances I desire the House to allow this substitute to be referred to the committee and printed. There was no discussion on the original bill among its friends. Its enemies were allowed to discuss it upon general principles; but in perfecting the bill there was scarcely any discussion or deliberation. I hope, then, that we will let this bill go over to-night. We shall gain no time by passing it this evening. We can finish it to-morrow, and if we make any amendment we can send it to the Senate the same day, so that it will get to the President about as soon as if we were to pass it to-night.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, for I want information. Under this bill no persons are appointed to office not detailed from the Army except such as are referred to in the language "other persons," meaning civilians under the authority of the military governors or commanders. Now, what oath are those appointees to take to fulfill the duties of the office which they are appointed to fill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The bill makes no provision in regard to that whatever, neither did the House bill. I suppose when an officer or soldier is detailed he acts under his oath as such officer or soldier.

Mr. LOGAN. You say there is a general law for all officers appointed by military commanders. There is but one oath required where a person does military service, and if they are appointed by military commanders there is no law, as I understand it, requiring them to take any oath of office.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is any oath of office required of a person detailed from the Army?

Mr. LOGAN. There is not; that is what I am asking about; there is no oath required.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; this is the point I make: if the military commander appoints a civilian, the law does not prescribe any oath; and if he details a soldier to perform soldier's duty, then I ask what oath the soldier takes to perform that simple duty? I only call the attention of the committee to this question with a view to have them consider it. I hope the substitute will be referred and printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will yield a moment to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish first to make an inquiry of the Chair. Suppose the motion to refer should fail, and the motion to concur in the Senate amendment should fail, could we then, by a vote of the House, request a committee of conference; and if so, what would be the right of the committee of conference to depart from the provisions of the two bills passed by the respective Houses?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the motion to refer and the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate shall both be voted down, the House can disagree absolutely in the amendment of the Senate, or disagree and ask the appointment of a committee of conference. If a committee of conference shall be appointed, inasmuch as the amendment of the Senate proposes to strike out the entire bill of the House, the whole question will be before the committee.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That will then bring about the state of things that I supposed it would if the House should take that course. Now, I think the experience and observation of all the members of the House in reference to bills of this importance is that the whole subject goes to the committee, who will have before them the views of each House, being in possession of the bills respectively passed by the two Houses. It seems to me that a state of things is now before us in which we may as well come directly to a committee of conference.

I would like to say, if I am not trespassing upon the time and patience of the House, that I do not like much of the phraseology of the House bill, and that I should be greatly pleased to see a more compact and careful bill, although I think the substance of what we want is in the House bill. I think we should make whatever bill we pass so compact that no coach-and-six can be driven through it hereafter by any Attorney General. I hope the motion to refer will not prevail, but that we shall have a committee of conference.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, the Senate have stricken out the whole of our bill, and there is nothing remaining about which the two Houses can confer.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand from the reply which the Chair made to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] that if a committee of conference is appointed the entire subject will go to that committee, and will be put in the hands of six men—three members of the House and three members of the Senate. For my own part I am not willing, in the first instance, until the Committee on Reconstruction shall have examined the matter, to place the whole subject of this bill in the hands of three members of the House and three of the Senate, whose conclusion will be forced through the House, as members well know, under the previous question. I hope, therefore, that the House will sustain the motion to refer the amendment of the Senate to the Committee on Reconstruction, and that it will be printed and laid upon the desks of members to-morrow morning. The Committee on Reconstruction can examine it and suggest such corrections as they think ought to be made. It seems to me that that would be only becoming a deliberative body like this. I know, sir, that we are all anxious to get home, but do not let us take to our heels and run away from Washington with our work half done, as we did before. I now demand the previous question on the motion to refer.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to his yielding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor for one hour and has a right to yield.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. By a comparison of these two bills it will be found, I think, that the difference between the two is merely a difference of phraseology, with the exception that the Senate has stricken out that section of the House bill proposing to impose a penalty for hindrance or obstruction of the act. The Senate, so far as I am able to discover, seeks to carry out the same line of policy as that favored by the House. I agree with some other gentlemen here that the Senate has succeeded better than we did in carrying out the policy which both Houses favor. But there is a difference of phraseology, and there is a difference as to the section in reference to penalties. Now, inasmuch as the two Houses have approached so nearly an agreement, it does seem to me that the adoption of the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] will bring this matter to a satisfactory conclusion better than any other method. Two committees representing the two Houses can no doubt, by conferring together, arrange readily the very few points of difference between the two Houses.

There is, as I have remarked, no difference of principle except upon one section. Should the House adhere to its position in reference to that section and the Senate also adhere, the matter will have to go to a committee of conference, after all. Such a committee is in all probability that method of settlement to which we shall ultimately be obliged to come; and, in my opinion, our differences will be adjusted better in that way than any other.

If the two Houses were differing upon principle, if they were differing upon any material points, I would insist that we should adhere to our position as long as might be proper, and as long as we could have any reasonable expectation of accomplishing our purpose. But the two Houses do not differ upon anything material except a single section. Why, then, should not our differences be settled in the manner in which such differences are usually settled—by referring them to a committee of conference? I hope that the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio will be adopted by the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to yield to me two minutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, give us anything but a committee of conference. Send this bill, if you choose, to the Committee on Reconstruction or to the Committee of the Whole, or to any investigating committee; but save us from the blunders and secrecy of a committee of conference. All the blunders of legislation, all the follies that have been committed in this House since I have been here have come through that great hole. [Laughter.] And nobody can see what is coming until it does come; and you cannot see it then until it has passed out of sight, [laughter;] and the first thing we know of it is when it is published in the official record. When a report comes to us from a committee of conference we must either reject the whole or swallow the whole, and generally we do not know which is which. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to refer the amendment of the Senate to the Committee on Reconstruction, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 74, noes 49.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, that the Senate amendment be ordered to be printed, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is not entitled to the floor. The floor reverts to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who yielded it temporarily that the amendment of the Senate to the reconstruction bill might be taken up.

The bill upon which the gentleman has the floor is in relation to additional bounties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I enter a motion to suspend the rules. I also move that the bill be ordered to be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now will yield to a motion to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the House (at nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS. ETC.

The following petitions &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BANKS: Memorial of James J. Rogers, of New York, a soldier of the Union Army, in behalf of naturalized citizens of the United States arrested or convicted in Ireland for alleged violation of the laws of the British empire.

By Mr. BROOKS: The petition of Mrs. E. N. Jackson for a renewal of a patent for a bell annunciator and telegraph.

By Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania: Resolutions of the Union Leagues of the city of Baltimore, asking for universal suffrage.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. CORNELIUS COLE, of California, and Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY, of Delaware, appeared in their seats.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the permission of the Senate to state that I was accidentally absent on the final vote on the passage of the bill supplementary to an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed the 2d of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed March 23, 1867. If I had been present I should have voted against the passage of the bill, for the reasons which I had the honor to present to the Senate on the passage of the original bill.

MAXIMILIAN'S DECREES IN MEXICO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution offered by me a few days since relative to Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. GRIMES. We understand what it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reading is unnecessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will submit the remarks I have to make upon the motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us take it up first.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I move to take it up for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is one of order, as I take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is one of order, whether the taking it up is in order under the rule of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no doubt of that. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer that question as to the construction of the rule to the Senate. I prefer that the Senate should construe its own rules.

Mr. GRIMES, (to Mr. CHANDLER.) Go on and make your speech on your motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, Mr. President, I will say what I have to say on the question of taking up the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether it is in order to take up the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is well known, it is an admitted fact, that the invasion of Mexico was in reality a part and parcel of our rebellion. If the United States Government had been at peace no one presumes that an attempt would have been made to establish an empire in the republic of Mexico. Had Maximilian gone to Mexico as other filibusters go, as Lopez and as the son of Henry Clay went to Cuba, and as others have gone, simply with his life in his hands in pursuit of a crown, he would have won a crown or lost his head, and no remarks would have been made. He staked his head for a crown, and there was no fault to be found certainly, nor had his friends a right to question the verdict. If he won, he won an empire; if he lost, he lost his head.

But, Mr. President, Maximilian claimed to be something more than an adventurer. He claimed to be something more than a filibuster. He claimed to have been elected by the Mexican people to occupy the Mexican throne; and I propose for a single moment to examine into that claim. I hold in my hand a letter from a very distinguished officer in our Army during the rebellion, who has since the close of the rebellion spent some months in Mexico, a man who is thoroughly acquainted with Mexican affairs, and who writes from a Mexican stand-point. He says:

"We all know how Maximilian was elected. Marshal Forey appointed thirty-five reactionary notables; these elected a regency of three—Generals Almonte and Salas and the Archbishop of Mexico, who had all been leaders in inviting the monarchy. These now elected a new assembly—all noted reactionists—and among them were found many of the men who had made Mexican horrors a proverb. The farce closed up with the election of Maximilian; and when General Bazaine made the electioneering tour, with forty thousand bayonets at his heels, seven eighths of the population of Mexico and twenty-nine thirtieths of its territory were beyond the lines of French protection, according to a reliable French calculation. Yet Maximilian accepted this unanimous vote. To say that he was ignorant of the way he was elected was an insult to his intelligence; for if nothing else existed at that time to prove the utter abhorrence of the great body of the Mexican people to the invasion the siege of Puebla, one of the most heroic defenses in history, was sufficient. Those who argue that Maximilian was deceived into the idea that Mexico wanted his government simply try to prove his intellectual incapacity."

Again, this same writer says:

"With the crushing and unprincipled hand of Bazaine, handling forty thousand French troops and the retrograde contingent that French gold supported, the empire commenced the desolation of Mexico. In this it was aided by William H. Seward, United States Secretary of State, who apparently impeded every effort of the republic to obtain arms in the United States, while all our ports appeared to be open to the empire from New York to the Rio Grande. At length the empire managed to hold possession of just those lines along which its bayonets gleamed. At no period of its existence, before or after, could a courier carry a letter safely between any two great cities without an escort. At this stage of the imperial game, Maximilian, exasperated at the desperate defense of the country, issued a decree October 3, 1865—do not forget, I pray you, that he went there to teach the Mexicans civilization—which for barbarity has not been equaled, and far surpasses the modern one of his brother, Francis Joseph, against the Hungarians. Under this decree the meanest officer of the empire could have arrested President Juarez and shot him inside of twenty-four hours without mercy; under this edict Mexico was put to the sword. I myself have seen the effects of its savage application. Northern Mexico especially was marked out for desolation, and thousands of the first people of the country bent to the bloody tornado, that spared neither age nor sex. I have passed through village after village leveled with the ground by imperial fiat after this decree was promulgated. Did the world cry out then with horror; or did the empire stifle with its gold the gurgle of the blood as it flowed from the veins of the republic?"

Mr. President, this pretense of an election, as every man at all acquainted with Mexican affairs knows, is but a mere pretense; for never, during the whole occupation of Mexico by the French troops, was it safe for a friend of the empire to step outside of the protection of French bayonets. Now, sir, I say that had Maximilian gone there as an ordinary filibuster, staking his life for a crown, his life would have been justly forfeited had he failed in revolutionizing the nation; but when, in addition to this unwarrantable filibustering expedition, he enacted that abominable decree, his life was more than forfeited. When he signed that decree he abandoned all hope of mercy unless he succeeded in putting down the Mexican republic. Why, sir, since the foundation of the world, no such decree was ever issued or ever executed; and yet, since I have offered this resolution, I have been informed by persons on the spot, and those of the very highest respectability, that the decree was more savage in its execution than it was in its enunciation. Look for a single moment at that decree, issued in the nineteenth century, by a prince of the house of Hapsburg, a filibuster in Mexico, a man who staked his life for an empire, and lost.

"ARTICLE 1. All persons belonging to armed bands or corps not legally authorized, whether they proclaim or not any political principles, and whatever be the number of those who compose the said bands, their organization, character, and denomination, shall be tried militarily by the courts-martial; and if found guilty even of the only fact of belonging to the band they shall be condemned to capital punishment within the twenty-four hours following the sentence."

Sir, had Maximilian joined, as it was expected he would do, the rebels, he would have had a far greater hold upon the United States of North America than he had upon the republic of Mexico. Had he united with the rebels he would have had just as much right to issue that decree and declare that every soldier fighting for the liberties of this Government was an outlaw as he had to declare that Mexicans were outlaws. Suppose that Maximilian had landed in the rebel States and he had executed that decree; suppose he had captured by surprise General Grant—for Ortega stood as high in Mexico as General Grant does in the United States—suppose he had executed General Grant and more than ten thousand of our Union patriotic soldiers, would there have been any cry for mercy for the man who had executed the damnable decree? Would there have been any pity for the monster? And yet the cases are exactly parallel, only that Maximilian would have had a stronger and a faster hold on this Government than he ever had on the Government of Mexico. The decree would not have been one single iota more inhuman and more barbarous had it been issued on the soil of the United States and executed upon General Grant and upon the Union soldiers of the United States than it was when issued upon the soil of Mexico and executed upon the body of Ortega.

But again:

"ART. 2. Those who, belonging to the bands mentioned in the previous article, will be captured with arms in their hands, shall be tried by the officer of the force which has captured them."

It made no difference whether the officer of the force who captured a Mexican patriotic general was a general in the French army, a general in the Austrian army, or a corporal in either: the officer in command of the squad that captured him was ordered peremptorily to execute him within twenty-four hours without reference to any higher authority.

"And he shall within a delay never extending over twenty-four hours after the said capture make a verbal inquest of the offense, hearing the defense of the prisoner. Of this inquest he will draw an act, closing with the sentence, which must be to capital punishment if the accused is found guilty, even if only of the fact of belonging to the band. The officer shall have the sentence executed within the twenty-four hours aforesaid, seeing that the criminal receive spiritual assistance. The sentence having been executed, the officer shall forward the act of inquest to the minister of war."

Then it goes on naming others who are liable to execution under this decree. I shall occupy but a very brief period in reviewing this decree. I am sure that the people of the United States do not understand this question, or there would not be a man in the United States who would not say that the Mexican Government was not only justified, but that it was its duty to execute a man who had thus violated every rule of civilized warfare upon her patriotic soldiers.

"ART. 5. Shall be tried and sentenced conformably with article one of this law."

That is, tried by the officers arresting them, and shot within twenty-four hours.

"1st. All those who will voluntarily assist the 'guerrilleros' with money or any other means whatever. 2d. Those who will give them advice, information, or counsel. 3d. Those who voluntarily, and knowing that they are guerrilleros, will put within their reach, or sell them arms, horses, ammunition, subsistence, or any articles of war whatever."

Mr. President, the man who, knowing that his brother was a soldier in the army of the republic, gave a meal, gave a ration to that brother, or protected him over night, was liable to be taken and shot within twenty-four hours by the officer making the arrest. The mother who protected her own son—and I am told that thousands of homes were desolated under this decree—the mother who protected her own son, who was engaged in patriotically fighting for his Government and his country, was liable to be taken out and shot by the officer who arrested her. Was such a decree ever executed in any civilized nation before? Was such a decree ever executed in a civilized age before? Not that I have ever been informed of.

After the issue of such a decree, the last hope of leniency to him was thrown away in the event of his failure, because in issuing and executing that decree Maximilian signed his own death-warrant, and he knew it. He never hoped that his life would be saved; he knew he had signed his death-warrant in signing that decree. But, sir, forsooth, because perhaps he is a prince of the house of Hapsburg the sympathies of the world are to be enlisted for this unhappy prince. When the son of Henry Clay—and certainly no American will say that the son of Henry Clay did not carry as good blood in his veins as the son or brother of any prince or potentate on earth—was arrested on a filibustering expedition, what was done with him? He was garroted. Lopez was garroted. Was there any mourning for him?

Suppose the son of Andrew Johnson should think it would be a very good thing to establish a republic in France; suppose he should land upon French territory and proclaim a republic; suppose he should succeed in gathering the republicans of France around him—and that is a far more probable and possible supposition than was the supposition that it would be attempted to establish an empire in Mexico in 1860—suppose the son of Andrew Johnson should do that, and should establish himself in France, and after awhile should issue a similar decree, and suppose he should arrest Marshal Bazaine and should summarily shoot him, and should shoot more than ten thousand of the soldiers of France, and he were afterward captured, what do you think would be his fate? The French Government has shown us how they treat rebels. They put them in a cave and smother them with smoke.

Suppose he had thought that republicanism would be a good thing for Ireland, and had landed on the shores of Ireland, and had proclaimed a republic in Ireland, and had issued a decree that all men fighting against the republic of Ireland were outlaws, and when captured by any of his soldiers should be summarily shot within twenty-four hours; and suppose in the process of time the British Government had put down the son of Andrew Johnson; what do you think they would have done with him? The British Government have shown us what they do with men who are guilty of rebelling against their Government. They shoot them from the mouths of cannon, and do it remorselessly.

Suppose he had landed in Austria, and had thought republicanism was a good thing for Hungary, and had issued a decree that every man fighting against the liberties of Hungary should be summarily shot; what would the Emperor of Austria have done? They have shown us how they treat political offenders: they whip them to death with the lash.

But the Mexicans were more merciful and more civilized and more enlightened. I think that Mexico made a mistake. I think she did wrong. I think the man who was capable of issuing and capable of executing that decree was not entitled to death by the bullet. I think a just retaliation would have been to provide that wherever and whenever arrested he should be summarily hanged. I think he forfeited his right to die a soldier's death. But the Mexicans were a chivalrous people, and they overlooked these outrages and granted him the very death that he would have received as an ordinary filibuster.

Mr. President, I am not discussing what I should have done, or what this nation would have done. I am discussing the right and the wrong of the thing, and what other nations have done or would do under such circumstances. The Mexicans might have been magnanimous and given him his life. They did not see fit to do it, and they were justified in not doing it. Maximilian never thought they would do it. He never dreamed of his life being saved. But now, forsooth, because this man has been shot, as he deserved to be, three nations go into mourning, and the representatives of those three nations are withdrawn from the Court of Mexico! I hope they never will be restored to the Court of Mexico. They have withdrawn their commercial agents from there. I hope those commercial agencies will never be restored.

Mr. President, Mexico during that long struggle of five years was our ally. Had she not resisted the French armies during those five years who knows but we might have had a diversion on our southern borders from the French army that was kept so busy by these patriotic Mexicans? Besides, it was under negotiation, as I am informed and believe, that the United States of America were to furnish a part of the territory for this empire. Negotiations were actually opened to surrender to them Texas and the large Territory of New Mexico. I say the United States were to furnish a large portion of this empire, had it been successful and had the rebellion been successful. This Mexican empire was part and parcel of the rebellion, and the Mexicans in their long and arduous and almost hopeless struggle for independence were our allies. How did we treat them while acting as our allies? Under the orders of the Secretary of State the French armies were permitted to purchase any material of war without stint or limit and ship it to Mexico. Thousands of mules and thousands of wagons and any quantity of war material was bought in open market and shipped to Mexico to aid this usurper. But, sir, when poor Mexico had bought a few thousand muskets, muskets that were not useful to us, our old smooth-bore weapons altered into percussion locks, and had them ready to ship, she could not get a clearance. The Mexican minister told me himself that he applied to the Secretary of State, and was by the Secretary of State referred to the Secretary of the Treasury. He applied to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury would not issue the permit, and he never got his arms into Mexico.

The course of this Government with relation to Mexico from the first has been a cowardly course. And now, sir, after we have left this Mexican nation to fight her battles alone, when the world is about to combine against her for aught we know, is this great nation to stand by and see the world combine against the republic of Mexico, or shall we issue an earnest protest against interference with Mexico by the Powers of the earth? Why, sir, it is but a day or two since that the following notification appeared in the New York Tribune:

"All the European Governments show the most intense excitement, and it can hardly be doubted that, but for the United States, a now and formidable combination of European Powers against the republican Government of Mexico would be formed."

But for the United States I have no doubt that that combination would be formed. But, sir, there is a United States; and you cannot find a man, woman, or child throughout the length and breadth of this land who was ever loyal to the Government of the United States who is not the friend of Mexico in her present trials and tribulations. Some condemn the action of Mexico, but I know of but three classes. In the first place, there are the humanitarians, who do not believe in the shedding of blood for any crime. They, under the leadership of Horace Greeley, are shocked that the blood of this man should have been shed. Then there is another class of men who see something wonderful in royal blood. They may properly be denominated flunkies, who, under the leadership of Raymond of the Times, hope to stand well with foreign despotic Governments by denouncing the Government of Mexico. Then there is another class of men who four years ago were crying, "onward to Washington," rebels, traitors, men who living at the North were in sympathy with treason, and they are now crying, "onward to Mexico." They are the men who never lifted a finger to save this Government, whose whole sympathies were against the Government; and now, forsooth, because Mexico has executed this man they shout, "onward to Mexico; onward to the halls of the Montezumas." It is not the people of the United States, it is not the men who put down this rebellion, who are condemning the Mexican Government for the execution of Maximilian. There are a few who do not understand the facts in the case who think that perhaps it might have been as well to have spared his life; but the very moment they understand the facts in the case they say that Mexico has nobly vindicated her manhood in executing the man who dared to promulgate and carry out the infamous decree to which I have called attention.

Mr. President, since offering this resolution the other day, facts have come to my knowledge so strong and so positive that I care very little whether this resolution passes or not. But, sir, if this Congress adjourns without passing a strong resolution, not only of sympathy, but of aid if need be, to Mexico in case she is again invaded by the despotisms of the earth, it will forever disgrace itself in the eyes, not only of the nations, but of the loyal people of this land. We want the Austrians, the French, and the English to understand that if they commence a war against Mexico now they have got to fight the United States of North America. Sir, pass a simple resolution of sympathy and aid and no nation will interfere with Mexico. There is no nation to-day on the face of the earth that wants a war with the United States. All the nations of Europe combined would not undertake to fight the United States to-day on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. President, now is the time to assert the Monroe doctrine to some purpose. There is not land enough on the continent of North America to hold an empire. It is not large enough, we have not room; and I want this Congress before it adjourns to say so in bold, manly language. I want to express sympathy for Mexico, and I want to assure Mexico that we appreciate the eminent services she has rendered us during the frightful rebellion through which we have passed, and to assure her that her good offices will not be forgotten, but that they will be reciprocated when opportunity offers.

Sir, Mexico has nobly vindicated her right to self-government by her powers of resistance and her powers of endurance. She has hoped against hope. She hoped for material aid from the Government of the United States, and inasmuch as we were both contending in the same cause she had a right to expect material aid from the Government of the United States. That material aid she never received. But now, sir, other nations that have heretofore monopolized the trade and the political influence in Mexico propose to cast her off and cut loose the bands that have bound them together for half a century. Very well, sir, I am glad to see it, and I propose now to say to Mexico, "We extend to you the right hand of fellowship; we are sister republics; you can rely upon our friendship and upon our aid." You may rest assured, sir, that never was there such an opportunity offered to any one nation as is now offered to this nation in a material point of view with regard to Mexico. All the commerce of that republic would naturally fall as a matter of course into the hands of the people of the United States, who stand by her in her hour of trial. Mr. President, I ask for the passage of the resolution.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON. As this resolution may be debated a little further, I ask the Senator from Michigan to give way for a moment that I may obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the purpose of raising four volunteer regiments in the Indian country, and to authorize the payment of some volunteers the Secretary of War has called out, and to make an appropriation to carry out the reconstruction act. If nobody objects to it, I should like to introduce the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order until the motion to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan is disposed of.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that that lie over for a few moments for this purpose.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better repeal our resolution and then proceed to business. There are matters in regard to the West which I want to bring forward, and I cannot do so under the resolution passed by the Senate. I think the better way is to repeal that resolution and let us proceed to business. I do not want to make an exception of one thing and then an exception of another.

Mr. WILSON. It seemed to be generally understood, as this was a matter of necessity, that there would be no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. I have a matter of necessity, too.

Mr. GRIMES. What does the Senator from Massachusetts propose?

Mr. WILSON. I propose to authorize the War Department to raise four or any portion of four regiments of mounted men in the Indian country, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay out of the Army appropriations some troops called out for that purpose.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the very measure I want brought forward; but I want it brought forward, not by unanimous consent, but by a repeal of our resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Then there is a section in it appropriating $1,648,277 to carry out the reconstruction act. That is the estimate of the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, which must be first disposed of.

Mr. FOWLER. Before the vote is taken on that proposition, if that is the question before the Senate, I desire to make a few remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up that resolution for consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. There is another question before us.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay that aside temporarily, for the purpose I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution of the Senator from Michigan. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to lay that motion on the table?

Mr. WILSON. Let us do that for a few moments.

Mr. ANTHONY, (to Mr. WILSON.) Do you want to pass your bill?

Mr. WILSON. I merely want to get it in and have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. As I understand, the Senator from Massachusetts merely wants to introduce his bill and have it printed. I suppose it can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope he will be allowed to introduce it and have it printed.

Mr. POMEROY. Is that with a view to legislation at the present session?

Mr. WILSON. I propose to call it up this afternoon or to-morrow, if the Senate allow me to introduce it now and have it printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then it will be time enough to raise the question under the rule.

Mr. WILSON. At that time I shall ask the suspension of the rule for the purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. Or unanimous consent?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the measure I have been trying to get before the Senate since I came here. I do not want to object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts? It can be entertained by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I will say that the bill which I propose to introduce is offered with the assent of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and I desire to have it read and printed.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 132) to provide for the calling out of volunteers to suppress Indian hostilities, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TIPTON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill on the same subject, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It can be done in a moment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not refer any bills at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the introduction of the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be received.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the Senator from Nebraska merely offers this bill with a view of having it printed and referred.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood him to say he wanted to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am opposed to that.

Mr. TIPTON. I ask that it be printed, then. It is on this same subject; and coming from the scene of these occurrences the Senate surely will grant me that poor boon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator merely wants to have it laid on the table and printed without going further, I shall withdraw any objection to it.

Mr. TIPTON. That is all I ask at the present time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 133) in relation to the suppression of Indian hostilities; which was read a first time, passed to the second reading, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution. I do not ask for its consideration to-day, but simply that it may go upon the files and be printed.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 58) to authorize the enlistment of volunteers for the suppression of Indian hostilities; which was read and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

MAXIMILIAN'S DECREES IN MEXICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Is the motion made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] to take up the resolution named by him in order under the rule of the Senate?

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments on this resolution, to repeat somewhat what I said in the Senate on a previous occasion. I know that it is a very late period to offer any expression of sympathy for the republic of Mexico; but it is perhaps better that it should be offered now than that it should not be offered at all. There was a period in the history of the revolution in Mexico when an expression of sympathy from the United States would have been of great service, not only to the republicans of Mexico, so far as they were concerned, but for the purpose of arresting that invasion which swept away so many of her citizens, and came well nigh ruining that republic. I apprehend that it was owing to a want of courage on the part of those who had the management of the foreign relations of the United States that the invasion of Mexico was commenced at all. Had there been an expression of opinion even from that Department of the Government at the proper time Maximilian would never have set his foot on the soil of that republic. That expression was not made. Not only was it not made, but more than that, the opportunity was neglected. The traditional policy of our Government, so long held sacred, was entirely ignored. As has been stated here this morning, not only was no relief afforded to the republicans of Mexico, no expression of sympathy, no determination to maintain our policy, but an entire giving away, an entire giving over of the Government of the United States to the interest of the invaders was manifested. That was the policy which was carried out on the part of the Republic of the United States. It is true it was at a time when we were engaged in a fearful war in our own country, when perhaps it was impossible to extend any great amount of material aid to the republic of Mexico; but we were not under those circumstances prevented from expressing our determination to maintain a doctrine which we had held sacred through so many years, if those who had charge of the foreign relations of the Government possessed the courage requisite to the exigencies of the times.

I propose to examine to some extent the question whether the people of the republic of Mexico were justified in the act that they have recently committed; whether they were justified in executing Maximilian, the pretended emperor, the real filibuster into that republic. For fifty years the republicans in Mexico have been fighting a desperate battle against the aristocratic interests in that country. In 1857 the contest broke out in the most remarkable manner, and the revolution then was carried over every part of that republic. Perhaps no republicans have ever fought a more devoted battle than did the republicans there from 1857 until 1861. An opportunity was then sought by the Emperor of the French, the Spanish Government, and the British Government to invade Mexico for mere pretended claims which they had trumped up for the occasion. The most extraordinary and unjust demands were made upon the republic of Mexico by those Governments. Mexico was invaded by these three great western Powers for the purpose of enforcing the payment of these pretended debts that they had arranged to suit the occasion. In the course of the procedure England and Spain withdrew from the contest, leaving Napoleon to manage it alone. His sole object was to obtain the possession of that Government for the purpose of founding an empire there, with the view of giving him possession of the India seas, as well as to arrest the progress of the Union southward; and not only to arrest the progress of the Republic of North America southward, but also for the purpose of severing the Republic of North America, for the purpose of aiding the rebels in consummating the rebellion they had already commenced.

Maximilian, the unfortunate individual who has been executed in Mexico, was made a tool of, I admit, by the French emperor, for the purpose of consummating his designs. His first great crime was in suffering his name to be used at all for the purpose of carrying out the views of the French emperor. But although supposed to be a mild and Christian gentleman, as has been alleged, he has shown himself to be one of the most accomplished barbarians of the age, the individual who has perpetrated the most barbarous deeds that have ever disgraced any country. Even the deeds which have characterized and distinguished the rebellion in the United States were not equal in barbarity to those which were inaugurated and perfected in this contemplated empire of Mexico.

He first, under the influence of his Austrian and French soldiers, had himself elected Emperor of Mexico, and then he claimed his position as resulting from the voice of the Mexican people, forced as it was, so far as there was an election, merely by bayonets. It was at this period, when he had a large force of foreign bayonets at his command, that the Mexican President, the republicans, and the patriots of Mexico, who were defending their country, were driven all over the republic, from one portion of it to the other. They retreated from one stronghold to another, all the time maintaining a gallant fight for their own country and their own institutions, never for one moment failing to maintain their position as patriots. This so-called emperor then proclaimed that these patriots were outlaws, and that they should be executed when taken prisoners, within twenty-four hours after they were captured. The punishment of death was to be inflicted upon them; and that punishment was inflicted, not only on many officers who were taken, but, from the accounts which I have received, on as many as perhaps ten or twelve thousand of the people of that devoted republic. Think of it, sir! under that most barbarous decree the blood of as many as ten or twelve thousand patriots was spilled upon the soil of Mexico, their native land, and for no other crime than that of defending their country and its liberties. Not only that, but he burnt down whole towns. Whenever the patriots passed through any village or town and received any succor from the people, the soldiers of Maximilian invaded that village or town, burnt the property, and left the unoffending citizens without homes and without any protection whatever. This was done not only in one, but in many instances. Here you have this pretended monarch, not only murdering soldiers whom he has captured, but burning down towns and the habitations of women and children, and turning them off without any protection whatever.

His master at length deserted him and left him there to maintain his existence, if possible. Here I will state to his credit that he showed some fidelity to the individuals that he had deluded from their duty to their country, and at that period of the contest determined to stake his fortune with them. I admit that in that he showed some courage and some faithfulness, far more than that which distinguished his seducer, the Emperor Napoleon, the very murderer of republics, who has slaughtered them wherever he has had a chance; first, in France; second, in Italy, and thirdly, in Mexico. The cause of the patriot President of that republic was strengthened; his army increased in power; he surrounded the invader and captured him, and subjected him to the laws, to be tried according to the laws of nations, and he executed him according to the law. This shows distinctly that these people had a just sense of that dignity which characterized them as a Government and as a people, and that they were determined to maintain that dignity, and to inflict punishment on every offender who should presume to violate the dignity of that nation; thus, although not so distinguished for their intelligence and their power and their influence as the Government of the United States, setting a most admirable example to the Government of the United States as to the manner in which we should have treated some of the terrible rebels in our own country.

Here, sir, is the simple, plain statement of the facts. Now it is as little, I think, as we can do—it is coming in at a miserably late hour, I know—but then it is the best we can do at this time, when the enemies of republican institutions, not only in the United States, but in Europe, are endeavoring to make war on the republic of Mexico, to express our sympathy with the act they have done, with the vindication of their national rights and their national honor, and to maintain the relation that we ought to maintain toward that Government. If we were true to ourselves in regard to this matter; if we were faithful believers in republican institutions; if we were brave, true, courageous defenders of republican ideas, we would stand firmly on the side of the republicans of Mexico, and maintain the position that they have assumed on this occasion. Perhaps no people have ever exhibited more true courage, more devoted patriotism, more fidelity to their institutions than have those people; and no man living at the present day has exhibited those traits of character in a higher degree than has the President of that republic.

How is it that you hear no expressions of sympathy for the followers of Maximilian who perished by the same just law and in the same bad cause in which he perished? Why are not those Mexicans who deserted their country and their country's cause and who died with Maximilian pitied and mourned for? It is simply because they were poor Mexicans and the other man was a prince. Why was it that you heard no expression of sympathy for Lopez or Crittenden or Walker who perished in just the same kind of a cause as that in which Maximilian has perished? For no other reason than because they were simply poor republicans and had not the position that Maximilian held in the world. It is a fact that republicans in America are almost as ready to bow down to kings and princes as are the people in the old countries themselves. There is a portion of our population, if not the entire population, that is as ready to do obeisance to royalty as any of the devotees of that caste in Europe. In this country we would expect of course parties to separate themselves distinctly on this question. Those who are truly in favor of republican institutions, those whose hearts sympathize with republican institutions, will sympathize with the act of this unfortunate, brave, true, and courageous people in their gallant and patriotic conduct on this occasion, in their proud position in maintaining faithfully their principles, and visiting vengeance upon the man who assailed the dignity of their national character, and assumed to wield the power and the sovereignty of the Mexican nation in defiance of truth and justice.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that Maximilian, the so-called Emperor of Mexico, did on the 3d day of October, 1865, issue the following decree:

MAXIMILIAN, EMPEROR OF MEXICO.

Having heard our council of ministers and our council of state, we decree:

ARTICLE I. All persons belonging to armed bands or corps not legally authorized, whether they proclaim or not any political principles, and whatever be the number of those who compose the said bands, their organization, character, and denomination, shall be tried militarily by the courts-martial; and if found guilty, even of the only fact of belonging to the band, they shall be condemned to capital punishment within the twenty-four hours following the sentence.

ART. 2. Those who, belonging to the bands mentioned in the previous article, will be captured with arms in their hands, shall be tried by the officer of the force which has captured them, and he shall within a delay never extending over twenty-four hours after the said capture, make a verbal inquest of the offenses, hearing the defense of the prisoner. Of this inquest he will draw an act, closing with the sentence, which must be to capital punishment if the accused is found guilty, even if only of the fact of belonging to the band. The officer shall have the sentence executed within the twenty-four hours aforesaid, seeing that the criminal receive spiritual assistance. The sentence having been executed, the officer shall forward the act of inquest to the minister of war.

ART. 3. From the penalty established in the preceding article shall only be exempted those who, having done nothing more than being with the band, will prove that they were made to join it by force, or did not belong to it, but were found accidentally in it.

ART. 4. If, from the inquest mentioned in article two, facts are elicited which induce the officer holding it to believe that the prisoner was made to join the band by force, without having committed any other crime, or that he was found accidentally in it, without belonging to it, the said officer shall abstain from passing sentence, and he shall send the accused, with the respective act of inquest, to the proper court-martial, in order that the trial be proceeded with by the latter, in conformity with article one.

ART. 5. Shall be tried and sentenced conformably with article one of this law: 1st. All those who will voluntarily assist the "guerrilleros" with money or any other means whatever. 2d. Those who will give them advice, information, or counsel. 3d. Those who voluntarily, and knowing that they are "guerrilleros," will put within their reach, or sell them arms, horses, ammunition, subsistence, or any articles of war whatever.

ART. 6. Shall also be tried conformably with the said article first: 1. Those who will hold with the "guerrilleros" such relations as infer connivance with them. 2. Those who, voluntarily and knowingly, will conceal them in their houses or estates. 3. Those who, by word or writing, will spread false or alarming reports by which public order may be disturbed, or will make against it any kind of demonstration whatever. 4. All owners or administrators of rural estates who will not give prompt notice to the nearest authority of the passage of some band through the same estates. Those included in paragraphs one and two of this article shall be punished by imprisonment from six months to two years, or by hard labor from one to three years, according to the gravity of the case. Those who, being included in paragraph two, were the ascendants, descendants, spouses, or brothers of the party concealed by them, shall not suffer the penalty aforesaid, but they shall remain subject to the vigilance of the authorities during the time the court-martial will fix. Those included in paragraph three of this article shall be punished by a fine of from twenty-five to one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment from one month to one year, according to the gravity of the offense. Those included in paragraph four of this article shall be punished by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars.

ART. 7. The local authorities of the villages who will not give notice to their immediate superiors of the passage through their villages of armed men will be ministerially punished by the said superiors by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, or by seclusion from three months to two years.

ART. 8. Whatever residents of a village who, having information of the proximity or passage of armed men by the village, will not give notice of it to the authorities shall suffer a fine of from five to five hundred dollars.

ART. 9. All residents of a village threatened by some gang, who are between the ages of eighteen and fifty-five years, and have no physical disability, are obliged to present themselves for the common defense as soon as called, and for failing to do so they shall be punished by a fine of from five to two hundred dollars, or by imprisonment of fifteen days to four months. If the authorities think it more proper to punish the village for not having defended itself, they may impose upon it a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, and the said fine shall be paid by all those together, who, being in the category prescribed by this article, did not present themselves for the common defense.

ART. 10. All owners or administrators of rural estates, who, being able to defend themselves, will not prevent the entrance on the said estates of guerrilleros or other malefactors; or, after these have entered, will not give immediate information of it to the nearest military authority; or will receive on the estates the tired or wounded horses of the gangs, without notifying the said authority of the fact, shall be punished for it by a fine of from one hundred to two thousand dollars, according to the importance of the case; and if it is of great gravity, they shall be put in prison and sent to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter conformably with the law. The fine shall be paid to the principal administrator of the rents to which the estate belongs. The provision of the first part of this article is applicable to the populations.

ART. 11. Whatever authorities, whether political, military, or municipal, shall abstain from proceeding, in conformity with the provisions of this law, against parties suspected or known to have committed the offenses provided for in said law, will be ministerially punished by a fine of from fifty to one thousand dollars; and if it appear that the fault was of such a nature as to import complicity with the criminal, the said authorities will be submitted by order of the Government to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter and punished according to the gravity of the offense.

ART. 12. Thieves shall be tried and sentenced in conformity with article one of this law, whatever may be the nature and circumstances of the theft.

ART. 13. The sentence of death pronounced for offenses provided for by this law shall be executed within the delays prescribed in it, and it is prohibited that any demands for pardon be gone through. If the sentence is not of death and the criminal is a foreigner, even after its execution the Government may use toward him the faculty it has to expel from the territory of the nation all obnoxious strangers.

ART. 14. Amnesty is granted to all those who may have belonged, and may still belong, to armed bands if they present themselves to the authorities before the 15th of November next, provided they have not committed any other offenses subsequently to the date of the present law. The authorities will receive the arms of those who will present themselves to accept the amnesty.

ART. 15. The Government reserves the faculty to declare when the provisions of this law will cease.

Each one of our ministers is charged with the execution of this law in the part which concerns him; and will give the necessary orders for its strict observance.

And whereas it is alleged that, under that inhuman and barbarous decree, issued in violation of the laws of war, the rights of the Mexican people, and of the civilization of the nineteenth century, Major General José M. Ortega, Brigadier General Nicholas Salazar, Colonels Diaz Paracho, Villa Gomez, Perez Millicua, Villands, and more than two thousand other Mexican patriots, officers and men, were inhumanly murdered in cold blood, after having surrendered as prisoners of war, in violation of every law and usage of civilized warfare;

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire as to the truth of the above allegations, and report the facts to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not exactly see, supposing the resolution to be in order, any practical object, so far as legislation is concerned, which may be accomplished by it. It is not proposed, I imagine, to follow it up by any legislative proceeding. It is a mere inquiry to ascertain what were the facts in relation to the charges contained in the resolution. After that information shall be obtained, we shall be pretty much in the situation we now are as far as Congress is concerned. It is desirable of course that events, like the one to which the resolution refers, should be ascertained, if any practical consequences are to follow from them.

My objection, however, is not so much to the resolution as to the terms of the resolution and the manner in which my friend from Michigan has thought proper to support his resolution. His information may be tinged, perhaps, with the medium through which it has come. Mine may have a different tinge, because of the medium through which mine comes. As I understand the fact, there were not even hundreds executed under the proclamation of the 3d of October, instead of thousands. I think that resolution says ten thousand. As I understand it, although Maximilian agreed to the promulgation of the order he himself directed that it should not be executed except from absolute necessity, and its purpose was that it should apply only to unauthorized brigand forces which were then prowling about Mexico, stopping stages and passengers, and committing all sorts of robberies and every species of atrocity. It was not intended to embrace any officer or soldier who was acting under the authority of the government of Juarez. I think it bears that interpretation upon its face, and upon an occasion to which it is not proper to refer except in general terms I undertook to satisfy the Senate that that was the meaning of that proclamation.

But even as far as the proclamation itself was concerned, whatever may be its meaning, my opinion is that Maximilian was so entirely at the moment under the control of the French commander that he consented to it in spite of his own protestations of the impolicy of such a provision. He was made to believe that the Government of the republic, as it was termed, had ceased to exist, and that there was no legally constituted force within the limits of Mexico, that they were nothing but guerrillas, carrying on a war of such a description as is usually carried on by a force of that character. The determination was to put an end to a warfare of that kind by force of this proclamation, shooting or hanging those who might be caught in the prosecution of such a war. As far as that is concerned—I mean as far as the principle which it involves is concerned—it is precisely what we have done during our late unhappy war. The enemy threatened us, I think the president of the confederacy said that the war could be carried on for years and years by means of a guerrilla force. These forces were organized in smaller or larger bands in several of the States, and upon more than one occasion when the parties were captured they were executed, and nobody in the United States found fault with the justice of such executions or with the policy of such executions. I do not know whether the order in question was intended to apply to any other description of force; nor do I know that it was applied to any other description of force; nor do I know the extent to which it was applied to that description of force; but, as I stated just now, the information which has come to me is that very few men who were captured as guerrillas were executed.

Now, Mr. President, we ought not to forget, as I think—and I have no feeling upon the subject other than that which involves the good name of our country and is called for by the usages of civilized life, political life—we ought not to forget the circumstances under which Maximilian came to Mexico. We have been in the habit of calling the Mexican Government a republic. We have treated it so officially. We have recognized it as a republic. But from the time of the original recognition up to the present, revolution after revolution has occurred, and in each instance it has been headed by a military chieftain. There has been no civil liberty in the land. The political chieftain of to-day succeeds, to yield only to another more fortunate one of to-morrow; and that is the case now. Juarez, in all human probability, will be in power, if he is in power at all, only for the moment. Some more decided military man (for Juarez I understand is not a military man and never was under fire) will soon be at the head of the Government; it may be Escobedo. I forbear to say what I have understood of Escobedo, for I do not know that the facts communicated to me are true; but he is a bold, daring man, perhaps of some military genius, and will stop at no obstacle which may stand between him and the acquisition of supreme power; and Juarez may share the fate that Maximilian has just met.

There is another thing that we ought not to forget; that that being the condition of Mexico she made an appeal to the United States to interpose by way of a protectorate. She was willing to enter into a treaty looking to that result. When I say that she was willing I mean that the wealth of Mexico desired it; the education of Mexico desired it; all the foreign population whose safety depended upon the maintenance of good order desired it. They applied to the United States, and they were refused. The treaty negotiated by Mr. McLane, of Maryland, then our minister to Mexico, would have brought about that result, and that was rejected. These citizens, therefore, of Mexico, failing to get the relief without which, as they supposed, they would be involved in ruin, went to Europe. They made their application finally to Maximilian. Maximilian agreed to come if supported by the armies of France, but only upon the condition that before he landed, he should have received the votes of the people of Mexico. Whether those votes were cast in his favor or not I do not know; whether, if they were cast physically, they were cast properly, fairly cast, or whether they were made to be cast by the force of French bayonets or other physical force, I do not know. But the fact is that such a vote was reported, and that upon the faith of that vote he left his home and came to Mexico. And how was he received? He was received at Vera Cruz with enthusiasm; his whole march from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico was an ovation; his entrance into the city of Mexico was equally enthusiastic; and he commenced a system of government, which, if it had been carried out, would have given to Mexico a better government than it had ever had in the past.

Now, I am not to be understood as justifying or excusing the Emperor of the French in interfering for the purpose which he did interfere with the condition of Mexico. He wanted, as he said in a letter, which was afterward published, to have the Latin race upon the American continent. He dreaded, as was evident, the growing power of the United States. I have no doubt he rejoiced in what he believed was then about to occur, the disruption of the United States, and he availed himself of that particular exigency in the condition of this country to take the step which he did. He has been forced to abandon Mexico almost in dishonor.

Mr. WILSON. Why not quite in dishonor?

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean dishonor as a soldier. I am not speaking of any other dishonor. There was no fighting which caused him to abandon it; but he saw—for he is an intelligent and far-seeing man, and how he should have been so short-sighted in the beginning of this expedition always amazed me—he is a far-seeing man in the general, and he saw that it would be impossible for him to maintain his army in Mexico after the dangers to the Union had ceased to exist and we were about to become again one people—a people powerful when divided, as the war proved, in all physical contests as powerful as any of the nations of Europe, but when united so powerful that it would be madness in France or in England or in any of the other Governments of Europe to join in the attempt to destroy or revolutionize the Government of Mexico or any nation in which the United States supposed it had an interest or which it was its duty to preserve, and he therefore abandoned the country.

Why did not Maximiliano go? There is something in his conduct that appeals, as I think, to the generosity of every man of generous feelings. He had abundant time to leave Mexico under the protection of the French army. No danger could have occurred to him. Why did he not go then? Because he loved honor more than life; because he apprehended that the men who had invited him into Mexico, and who had followed his fortunes during the period of that struggle, would be sacrificed to the mad or just passion of the conqueror if the Juarez government should be the conqueror, and he determined upon remaining and sharing the fate of his friends; and among those, as I believe, are found very many of the best men in Mexico; very many foreigners of all nations; men of education and of wealth, who looked to the certainty of losing property, and perhaps losing life, if the imperial government should be surrendered or abandoned; and they invoked him to remain; and listening to the impulses of a noble ambition at that moment he determined to remain.

What was his condition up to the period of his execution, from the time he took the reins of government? Recognized by all the civilized nations of the world except the United States; not only recognized, but with representatives to his court from every civilized nation of the world other than the United States. He was the head, then, as far as the world was concerned, of a legitimate nation. He was carrying on the war as the head of a legitimate nation. He was captured, as it is said, by treachery. I do not know how the fact is. It is said that his success would have been complete but for the alleged treachery.

But, however that may be, he was captured and sentenced to death, and that sentence executed. What for? Because he came under the protection of French bayonets—is that a cause for executing him? Because he remained there at the instance of Mexicans—is that a cause for executing him? Because he was not recognized by the United States—is that a cause for executing him? Could he not say with justice, and will not history say so hereafter when it comes to record the events of the day, that he who was recognized as the head of a Government by all the nations of the world had a right to do what every nation in the world has a right to do, to carry on war, and that he cannot be executed in the event of his being captured?

Mr. President, as I have stated the United States are all powerful; but there is a weakness into which they may fall. They will prove to be all and sufficiently powerful in every righteous cause, in every judgment that strikes the good sense of the world; but if they vindicate an act which has shocked the sensibilities of all other nations, they will find that at least in moral strength they have lost ground.

The honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. FOWLER] has intimated that no feeling of regret has been expressed in relation to the execution of republican soldiers or generals. That is not applicable to me. Would to God that all violence of that description as between belligerents should cease and never be revived. The laws of war are not now what they were in former ages. They partake of the civilization of the world. They have been tempered by the good sense and the humanity of the world. They have been, above all, tempered and modified by that spirit of mutual good will from man to man which we have been taught by the Saviour of our race. They, therefore, at this moment of the world, denounce as an atrocity any violence not necessary to accomplish the purposes of a just war.

Now, what was to be accomplished by the execution of Maximilian? His army captured; the foreign troops upon which he relied for the most part gone; himself a prisoner, anxious and willing to depart; why not have let him depart? Has Mexico strengthened herself by his execution? To say nothing of public opinion across the water, what, judging from the press of the day, is the public opinion among ourselves? Nothing but deep sympathy and regret, nothing but strong condemnation of the act, almost throughout the United States. A young man in the prime of life, educated, and, except so far as the evidence to the contrary is to be found in this proclamation, a man of remarkable humanity, an accomplished gentleman, made a mistake, a political mistake. His object was the resuscitation of Mexico. He was told, and told truly, that hardly a month passed in which it was not shaken to its center by some political convulsion, and he was urged to go among them, and if he could, to terminate a state of things so fatal to the progress, the prosperity, and the individual happiness of the citizens of that country. He has paid dearly for his enterprise; but he has died, from all accounts, like a brave and honorable man, and his death has been the consequence of his having acted, after being abandoned by Napoleon, from the impulses of a brave and honorable man.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have no feeling of anxiety about the exact wording of this resolution. I care nothing as to whether it shall be amended or its substance embodied in a different form. I am forcibly impressed with the importance of this discussion; and as it has been introduced, I think the subject demands an impartial review at the hands of all of us.

In looking at the map of the world we find that Mexico forms a part of this continent, and an important part of this continent in view of its proximity and locality to our own Government; and he who looks carefully will see that in order to complete the symmetry of this republic we need and will have, the addition of Mexico as belonging to us.

I do not quite agree with the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat in regard to the object of Maximilian's going to Mexico. I deny, from the history of the time, that his object was to resuscitate or regenerate Mexico. His object in going there was not to benefit Mexico, but to injure us; for nobody at this hour will pretend to deny that the Mexican invasion was a part of the whole scheme of rebellion; that the French were to divert and divide our armies, as they supposed, by an invasion of Mexico, while the English Government was to amuse itself by making the ocean light with the blaze of our commerce. Early that policy developed itself, and all the crowned heads of Europe, monarchical or imperial, were engaged in the work of aiding the rebellion by attempting to overthrow this Republic. Therefore I fail to share in the feeling of the distinguished Senator from Maryland when he says that he sympathizes with Maximilian for this noble purpose of attempting to regenerate distracted Mexico.

I do not know that the history of the Mexican republic in all its worst features has exhibited worse attributes than have been exhibited by the Government under which this archduke was reared. Cruelties as unparalleled and on a much larger scale by that enlightened Government has the world witnessed than have been seen on a much smaller scale in the republic of Mexico. I therefore look at this subject from a different stand-point entirely; and this discussion can only be profitable in view of our future relations with this natural portion of our own country.

The distinguished Senator from Maryland says that Juarez will soon be no more, and that Escobedo or some other potent man in arms will take his place, and the world will witness another revolution. There was one thing, however, that the Senator failed to comment upon. This man Juarez, to whom history and an enlightened world will pay proper tribute hereafter, under circumstances that would have disheartened even our own Government in all its strength, with all its power—with small armies, no baggage trains, no supplies, no treasury, guided alone by that star of liberty by which he has steered through a long night of trouble, of vexation, of anxiety and care, has never lost sight for one moment of that principle which the world begins to worship now—the principle of liberty. I feel rebuked, and Senators here should feel rebuked, for their want of attachment to that principle as compared with the attachment that that half-benighted people of Mexico have exhibited to it. Sir, no trials that we have undergone on our bloodiest fields with all our power, will compare with the trials of struggling Mexico for liberty; and I say I feel rebuked myself, born in the full blaze of liberty, that they with but indistinct and uncertain glimmerings of its beauty are more attached to it as a principle than even we who receive it as an inheritance.

Sir, let me suggest to the distinguished Senator from Maryland that a people who love liberty as well as these Mexicans have proved they love it no mortal power can ever overthrow. They will find its advocates at the sources of rivers and in the gorges of mountains. They will find them in just such bands as this bloody emperor issued his decree against, where rivers rise upon the mountain heights and in the deepest valleys, and their song is the music to which emperors do not listen with pleasure. Their songs are the songs of liberty, and those songs have their energetic power to nerve a people, half benighted as they are, to deeds of wondrous daring.

Juarez, says the Senator, is not a warrior. Neither was Lincoln; and yet he led armies that have astonished the world to victories that have likewise astonished the world. Juarez, like Lincoln, was a great and a good man; good for his fidelity to the principle of liberty, even when the last star of hope grew pale.

The distinguished Senator says that Maximilian was made a tool of by the Emperor of France. In the first place I deny the proposition, from the information I possess in relation to it; and in the next place, if he was, he did not know enough to bear transportation from Austria to Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very unwilling to arrest for a moment the honorable member from Nevada; but I did not say that he was made a tool of.

Mr. NYE. I understood so. You said that he was made the instrument of the Emperor of France.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I said he was protected by France, not that he was made a tool of by Napoleon or anybody else. I do not think he could be made a tool of.

Mr. NYE. Sir, I am one of those who believe that the overthrow of the Republic of America was a question of consultation among the crowned heads of Europe, and in looking over those countries this was the only surplus scion of royalty that they could spare from any of those Governments; and he was chosen for the reason that he was of royalty. He came here. My friend from Maryland says that he was received with great enthusiasm at Vera Cruz. Yes, he was. Who received him? It was the royalists of Mexico and the royalists of all Europe that had congregated there, what the Senator terms the wealth and the learning of Mexico. Against that was a determined people who in their ignorance were not to be transformed in a moment from liberty to pay tribute to a Crown. When did that enthusiasm die out? When the emperor that sent this archduke found that the job was hopeless, never until then. It was not Mexicans that received him as a class. It was the descendants of that old Castilian race who cling yet to traditional imperialism. But, sir, the class that have grown up there, the people of Mexico, are as ardent in their attachment to liberty as the American citizen himself with all his intelligence. I confess very frankly I have no sympathy with these imported monarchs. Maximilian came, not to regenerate Mexico, but to take it by force of arms. It is not the first time that Mexico has been taken in that way. One other archduke, or archdevil, or some fellow took it before, but he did not hold it long. The people then began to rise, and the murmurings of that day make every valley echo with their music now.

My friend from Maryland does not quite like the Emperor of France. Nor I; and I desire to institute here a comparison to show why. He says that Maximilian came by what he called an election, the voice of the people. Sir, it was the voice of imperial power. The French Emperor, who now holds his throne so securely, ascended that ladder by the great American institution, the ballot. But, sir, there was the ballot-box, and there were the guillotine and the sword. "Vote for Napoleon and you are safe; vote against him and you are gone." So it was in Mexico; "vote for the emperor and you are safe; vote for Juarez and you are lost." I have no respect for such an election, and I have no respect for the intelligence of any archduke who should receive it as evidence of what the people want. The argument impeaches either the intelligence or the integrity of this archduke. No, sir, it was a crowned-head consultation, in answer to these emissaries from Mexico desiring imperial power over Mexico. Her masses could not be heard there; but the consultation was held in the French capital; it was held in the Austrian capital; it was held in the Prussian capital; it was held by representatives of every crowned head of Europe except Russia; and this offspring, this emperor, was born of that consultation. He went out to gather an empire. In it he has found a grave, and an enlightened world will say hereafter to that, amen.

Why, sir, but a few years ago one of our own citizens, a citizen of this Republic, called the "gray-eyed man of destiny," invaded one of the Central American republics. He was shot, and the world said they served him right. Why was not Walker as precious as Maximilian? Europe has gone into mourning. Why? Because a scion of royalty has fallen. But enlightened America, while it records his death and admires his bravery in his last hours, cannot but admit that it is the fate of the warrior who takes his life in one hand and a desire to steal an empire in the other and crosses the sea for felonious purposes. He understood his fate and met it like a man. Europe will mourn, and I mourn here because I hate to see a brave man so deluded.

But, sir, how did the Mexicans reason? From the western coast of Mexico to Vera Cruz—ay, sir, from Acapulco to the Rio Grande, they have been pursued through every mountain gorge; they have been hunted as the hound hunts the hare; they have been wading literally through rivers of blood for four or five years, resisting the allied Powers of Europe, and an entire want of sympathy in America so far as material aid was concerned. They have been resisting this till the very waters through which they passed seemed as if their dropping blood reddened them to cry enough. Just at this moment and at this period of this history Maximilian is taken prisoner. There was an offer by the Queen of England, by the Prussian king, by the Austrian throne to go bail, if they would let him go, that he would never come back. How did the Mexicans reason? They counted over the bloody fields and the bloody paths over which they had walked; they saw a decimated and impoverished people; they saw that future struggle was to them more terrible than the past; and they said, "This man that could rally Governments of imperial strength around him before this war commenced, with the resentments and prejudices incident to defeat will rally around him stronger Powers and stronger Governments to come back again and invade us and retake the throne he has lost." I think the Mexicans reasoned well. They think now of allying in Europe to go to war with Mexico for his remains; and if they will do that over the dead what would they do for the living?

But let me ask the Senator from Maryland what business is it to us or the Governments of Europe how Mexico treats her foes? We would not allow them to interfere in our affairs. Suppose, for instance, that when the final clinch of arms came here, when Grant had them by the throat at Richmond, England, France, Prussia, and Austria had all come together and said, "Here is going to be bloody work: some of you are going to be killed: stop where you are: wait for humanity's sake;" or said, as they did say, "You may catch Mr. Davis, and if you do, for God's sake do not shoot him." What said our people to that? "Stand off; we settle our own affairs: we are the judges of our own matters." Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland one question: suppose that Juarez had been the unfortunate one, how long would he have lived?

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member wants me to answer, I do not know; but I suppose just as long as he will live now.

Mr. NYE. He would live probably under the advice of the allies of Maximilian, of Miramon and Mejia. They would have advised undoubtedly to keep Juarez alive for some time. What does Miramon say in his dying hour? All that he regrets is that the nation hereafter can point to his children as traitors. Sir, the Mexicans are peculiar in this respect; they execute judgments speedily. I recollect that when Santa Anna, in one of his invasions or in one of his fights, captured one of the most celebrated generals in Mexico and sent him word that he would be executed at three o'clock in the afternoon, the general replied: "Give General Santa Anna my regards, and tell him I am much obliged to him for his grace, for if I had taken him he would not have lived five minutes." It is a kind of custom these Mexicans have. They are enlightened enough to love liberty over the glittering baubles of imperial power. They love it well enough to fight for it in every mountain gorge, and no crowned heads can ever interfere there.

Sir, I have said all I desire to say about Maximilian. His history is written. He attempted to steal an empire and failed, and instead of finding a throne he found a grave. That sums up his history. A foolish prince that started to gather empire and gathered nothing but a hempen collar.

Mr. President, I was fully impressed with one remark made by the Senator from Michigan: this continent has no place for a throne. I have seen a little of this struggle in Mexico myself. I have been in the habit of going up and down that coast for six years; and my blood was made to boil when I witnessed this fact: I have seen our ships from San Francisco to Acapulco laden with supplies for the French army; and I have seen the Mexican exiles on that coast begging for God's sake to get in a load of ammunition or arms, and the eyes of this Government, through their revenue-cutters, were as sharp as the eagle's flash upon them. Sir, I sympathized with the struggling Mexicans then, and do now; and it was unbecoming this great Government, whose institutions rest upon the same hypothesis and theory, to furnish horses, provender, bread, and wine to these imperial powers, and refuse them to the thirsty, dying, starving Mexicans, who were fighting for a cause similar to our own. But, sir, I had no power to wield this Government. All that I could do was to look and weep.

But, Mr. President, my eye was always gladdened with one thing there. I was always glad to get to Acapulco, a snug little land-bound harbor, in which our ships and the Mexican fleet rode at perfect ease, land-locked entirely, except when the ocean would lash it into disturbance. Right on the mountain-top above, not two miles from the imperial garrison, stood flaunting the republican flag of Mexico, and every Frenchman and every traitor in Mexico that attempted to pass that flag was a dead man. There stood a man—Alvarez—with the frosts of eighty winters upon his head, with a blade that flashed defiance to imperial combinations, with five thousand Mexicans in that mountain pass, and he would have held it till the last Mexican was dead. There were seen under the folds of that flag this old hero and his two sons, worthy sons of a worthy sire. His integrity and his love of liberty had been transmitted to them, and he had infused this body of Mexicans with the spirit of liberty. France, with all her power; Prussia, with her needle-gun; Austria, with her legions of infantry, could never break the lines of Alvarez in that mountain gorge. For more than forty years has he stood guard in that mountain gorge, and there he will stand till he goes to the reward of the faithful and the liberty-loving in a better world, where there is no war.

The Senator from Maryland, in my judgment, underrates the power and the intelligence of this Mexican people. I have learned in my intercourse with them to have a high regard for them. They lack, it is true, that power of consolidation which is incident to education and refinement; but, sir, from the poorest to the richest, from the lowest to the highest, from the peon to his master, their evening hymns all sound of liberty and freedom; and the Mexican that I heard make an address in San Francisco stirred my very soul with his eloquence when he said that "music was born when liberty spoke." Sir, it is not wise for this nation to underrate Mexico. By every principle of sympathy that binds man to man and nation to nation we should be their friends and their allies. If, in the hour of our weakness, imperial Europe felt able to establish an empire in Mexico, with no other view than to distract our forces and overthrow our Government, we should say, in the hour of our strength, "Europe, hands off from Mexico: the ferry over which you come will be dangerous if you attempt to invade this sister republic." I would say it in the kindest spirit. I would not offend any of the imperial Powers by it if language could prevent it, but I would give them to understand most explicitly that we were quite at leisure now, and that we have an eye outward as well as inward.

Sir, what did France want with Mexico? She wanted it to break the commercial power of this mighty nation that faces the Pacific for four thousand miles. She wanted harbors and commercial marts and ports upon the western shores of Mexico. Sir, they were not made for France. As to this little innocent desire which the Senator from Maryland says Napoleon had to infuse the Latin race into Mexico—I take it for granted Maximilian shared in that—he could not get the infusion there. It was a cross that could not be made. Liberty and imperialism have no progeny. Sir, it is written upon the map of this continent that it is ours, and we are going to have it.

Mr. WILSON. Do not be in a hurry.

Mr. NYE. I am in no hurry. We can let it alone; keep other hands off; allow no nurse from abroad for Mexico; if she needs one, we will nurse her ourselves. We will not attempt to establish an imperial power, but we will attempt what we can do: raise the standard of their intelligence and increase their love for republican institutions. The duty of the United States at present is that of a great teacher; indeed, I may say that the United States at the present day is a great missionary. Every flag that is borne upon our masts bespeaks the power and freedom of the Government at home. Every lesson that we teach in the uprising of mankind from slavery to freedom is an infusing accelerator into the mighty enginery of the downtrodden of the world. It gives them hope; it gives them life; and our noble example of clothing four million slaves in the garments of citizenship is a lesson to the people of all continents to-day that that prize and boon is within their grasp. Such, sir, is the way that I would conquer Mexico. I would conquer her with our benign principles. I would scatter our population among them, and make every one of them a missionary. I would have them speak encouraging words of promise for the future of that country.

These great imperial Powers that the Senator from Maryland is so fearful of offending are not above one of the meanest attributes of our nature—cupidity. The history of the century has spoken of the hidden, undeveloped, and developed wealth of Mexico. Her mountains are full of the precious metals. In her valleys grow every tropical fruit, and cotton flourishes there as well as in South Carolina. France and imperial Europe wanted these things. They had inducements held out by the rebels, with whom they were acting as allies. That these eleven tribes that went out with Jeroboam or Jefferson, it makes no odds which, only on Jeroboam they never had any Committee on Reconstruction, and I sometimes wish they had not on Jefferson, [laughter]—they had inducements held out that these eleven States would form a part of Maximilian's empire. You saw it in their public prints; it was published everywhere. Thank God, if they were going to have an emperor for these southern States even they had got to import him. There were none here. Our fathers put an end to their reign here, and another emperor will never live as a ruler upon the continent of redeemed America.

Mr. President, the conduct of the United States toward Mexico should be that of fraternal kindness, of sisterly sympathy, of kind words and encouragement and promise, and if need be the strong arm of intervention to this monarchical attempt to distract and destroy her. Sir, the history of Juarez will live through all time. The history of Maximilian will only be remembered as a warning to other scions of imperial power. Therefore, while I can drop a tear of sympathy over the fall of this man, yet I stand here to declare what I honestly and religiously believe, that his death and the manner of it will be a more potent event to Mexico than even our own triumph over rebellion.

Sir, the French emperor and the Austrian Government are in mourning. A prince is dead. But Mexico, thank God, is not dead, but liveth. It lives in the embrace of a liberty-loving people. It lives surrounded by as many heroes, in proportion to numbers, as any other band that ever fought for liberty. I know oppressors will mourn, but America should rejoice. I know that it is a great failure upon the move of the chess-board of the imperial world; but it is an indescribable victory for liberty and freedom that should make every American heart exultingly hope, not only for Mexico, but for people struggling for freedom everywhere.

I hope, therefore, that this body will pass some resolution clearly indicating, and in most explicit terms declaring, that our sympathies as a nation, individually and collectively, are and have been with the struggling Mexicans. At once there should be sent from here to Mexico no inferior man, but a master hand; a man who sees where liberty has been wounded and knows the remedy to apply; a man whose heart beats high in sympathy with struggling freemen everywhere, and who should be a guide to them now in the labyrinth in which they seem to be going. Send no chargé. Pick out your master mind. I would be delighted, if we could spare him from here, to have the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations go. I should be glad to see the towering genius of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts there, giving the light to their pathway that he has so long given on the pathway of this Government. That is the way we should interfere—send a living man there; a man whose very eye bespeaks his love of liberty; a man with his compass broad enough to comprehend the wants of a struggling nation; a man so familiar in the pathway of struggling freedom that he knows that his footing is sure, to lead them and say to them, "This is the way; walk therein." Such, sir, is the interference that we can give. The power and influence of a legislative expression of this great nation at this time would be to them what the draught is to the thirsty or food to the hungry. It would be to them the resurrection and the life in the pathway of future progress.

One word more, sir, and I have done. These people, whether they are in the Senate or out of the Senate, that set back upon the old idea that kings and emperors are to reign, misjudge. The little time that you and I, sir, have lived has seen worked a perfect revolution. More history has been made in your day than for twelve centuries before; why? Because we have lived in a living age. If I was asked to-day what inscription to put upon a passing monument as we go as indicative of the spirit of this age, I would inscribe "progress"—progress individual and collective, progress in the upward ascent to the Heaven for which man has struggled; I see it in everything. Emperors' diamonds shake in their crowns while the tread of coming millions is heard. A decree that the workingmen of England shall not gather in Hyde Park tomorrow, by a vote of Parliament, at night is revoked ere the sun kisses the soil in the morning. Why? They hear the tread of coming millions. Rome to-day, under the genius of this progress, is on the eve of a revolution, civil, political, moral, religious. Under the glaring and blazing eye of a Garibaldi, who seems by infusion to have awakened the echoes of the old Romans, we see the Roman soldiery marshaled by thousands upon their plains. Sir, it is progress. Mexico, in this pathway of progress, lies right where we can give her aid; she is a sister republic; our soils touch; our productions are the same. They are rich in everything but men. We should furnish them those, and incorporate them, as they deserve to be by their valor, by their tenacity, by their patriotism, with this greater, nobler, higher body which has advanced in progress, and bleach them out, and make them a part of one harmonious whole.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise not to occupy the time of the Senate on this subject, but rather to express my entire concurrence with the view taken of this matter by the learned Senator from Maryland, when he says that we ought to move slowly and cautiously, and not take everything for granted, but endeavor to acquire the proofs in the case and reach the facts of the case. I approve of that. It is surely nothing but reasonable that we should get at the facts before we pass a judgment. Well, sir, a judgment has been passed in this case. If we are rightly informed, Maximilian, after being captured and made a prisoner, was in regular form subjected to trial by court-martial, and after such hearing as is usual in such courts in Mexico, he was duly convicted of some offense against the authority of the Liberals in Mexico, and executed. I do not rise to impeach the judgment of a court. It is rather my duty, as a citizen of the United States and as a Senator, to take it for granted that this court-martial acted properly, legally, fairly, in accordance with the laws of war, and that the execution of their judgment is also regular and legal; and it devolves upon the opposite party, who impeach this proceeding, if I may allude to it as a sort of legal proceeding, to show in what respect there has been any error or irregularity. Maximilian was tried for something; he was convicted; he was executed. Now, sir, I should like the Clerk to read the first clause of the imperial decree of the 3d of October.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. All persons belonging to armed bands or corps not legally authorized, whether they proclaim or not any political principles, and whatever be the number of those who compose the said bands, their organization, their character, and denomination, shall be tried militarily by the courts-martial; and if found guilty, even of the only fact of belonging to the band, they shall be condemned to capital punishment within the twenty-four hours following the sentence."

Mr. HOWARD. That is it. We do not know, because we have no proof before us at all, whether this order, and any action under the order, was introduced in evidence before the court-martial which tried Maximilian. It may be that such was the case; but thus far we are not informed. But whether it was the case or not, it seems to me that every right-minded citizen, every true lover of even military justice, every lover of honorable warfare, every man animated by a proper sense of honor, cannot but rebuke and condemn that most singular decree. What is it in its essence? Nothing more nor less than this: that every individual belonging to an armed band in Mexico, not authorized by law, is to be summarily shot if he happens to be made a prisoner. Authorized by what law? The decree does not explain. Was it the law of the republic, at the head of which was Juarez as president? That does not appear. Was it the law of the empire? If not either of these, what law, I beg to inquire of the honorable Senator from Maryland, was referred to?

Now, the question whether the party accused under that order belonged to a band that was authorized by law or not, was precisely the main question to be decided by the single officer—it might be a sergeant—before whom the party arrested was to be taken and tried; and the decree was so formed and so framed as to impose upon that single officer the duty of deciding whether the band was authorized by the law of Mexico, and whether, if so authorized, the law of Mexico itself was an authority for such an organization. It is not to be denied, Mr. President, that this decree opened the whole question, both of law and of fact, and left it to the officer who happened to have the good fortune to make the arrest to determine both the law and the fact, and there was no appeal. We all know perfectly well that the republican armies of Mexico were not organized in any considerable military bodies in their operations against the imperial forces; but they were from various causes necessarily divided up into small bodies and small squads; and in this way, for want of supplies and want of arms and other necessities, they were obliged to carry on the war against the imperial forces aided by the forces of France. Sir, it was an order unworthy of the age, unworthy of the French commander, if he made it, utterly unworthy of the spirit of even French law and French institutions, unworthy of an honorable soldier; an order under which, undoubtedly, any number of republican soldiers fighting for the republic might be executed, and were intended to be executed, whether they were or not. And in this I find the atrocity of the order itself.

Sir, do not tell me that an emperor, or a general, or a king, who issued such an order as that, knowing as Maximilian was bound to know its complete legal effect and its necessary practical consequences, can be a magnanimous, courageous, and honorable man. It was the order of a temporarily successful highway chief, to put down and murder all persons who were found in opposition to his progress.

In my opinion, Maximilian met his just fate, and I am not inclined to join in the extensive lachrymation and mourning which seems to be pervading the Courts of Europe on this occasion. He undertook, at the instigation of the French emperor, to play the same game in poor Mexico that the allied Powers of Europe, including Great Britain, Prussia, and Austria, undertook to play in regard to France itself during the first Revolution. They undertook to say to the French people—these same crowned heads who are now mourning for Maximilian—undertook to say to France what should be her form of government, and employed means to put down the movement in that country and to extinguish the republican spirit which rose up in that wonderful epoch. Is it not a little remarkable that the Emperor of France should have this same poisoned chalice commended to his lips, that his brave uncle commended to the lips of those who interfered to put down the French people?

But, sir, I will not detain the Senate longer upon this subject than to say, as friends of Mexico, as friends of the independence of nations, and of the right of peoples constituting nations to form their own governments in their own way, as friends of the principle of liberty throughout the world, it becomes us to stand firmly, honestly, and courageously by Mexico in her struggle against the imperialism which she has just overthrown. I shall not, for one, join in these funeral ceremonies; I shall not put on sables, because a man crossed the ocean, converted himself into what, in my judgment, is very little better than a highwayman, and finally failing to accomplish the object of his guilty mission, found a grave where he expected to find an empire and a permanent throne.

Mr. YATES. I presume the Senator from Michigan is not anxious to press a vote on the question of order at this time, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FOWLER. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I desire the privilege of introducing a resolution, which I desire to have printed and laid on the table.

Mr. YATES. I withdraw the motion for the present.

REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENTS IN STATES.

Mr. FOWLER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill for the proper enforcement of the first clause of section four, article four of the Constitution, namely:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

And that said bill among other things shall require all changes made in the organic law of any State to be ratified by the people of the State and by the Congress of the United States, and shall prohibit any new form of government or constitution hereafter made from going into operation until the same is duly authorized by a law of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. YATES. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. POMEROY. That motion cannot be discussed under our rule; but there is no executive business that I know of to transact.

Mr. GRIMES. We will settle that when we get in.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to going into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until four o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to substitute seven.

Mr. SUMNER. Why take a recess now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be first put on the longest time proposed.

Mr. SUMNER. If we are to have a recess, I hope it will not be till seven o'clock.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate take a recess till four o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Say half past three or a quarter before four.

Mr. DRAKE. Why take a recess at all?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because we have nothing to do at present.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes five, noes not counted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now I move that the Senate take a recess until half past seven, and on that I wish to say a word to the Senate. It is very certain that by remaining here now we cannot have the reconstruction bill back from the House of Representatives before the usual dinner hour. The House committee have recommended a number of amendments to our bill. If those amendments prevail it involves the necessity of engrossing the bill again, which of course must take time. It cannot be known what amendments are to be engrossed until they are acted upon. If we remain here, we may not perhaps get the bill before six or seven o'clock. Now, we may just as well go home and come back at half past seven. We shall lose no time by it, but it will give us an opportunity to get our dinners. Perhaps by that time we may get the bill; I hope so.

Mr. WADE, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) I wish the Senator from Illinois would withdraw his motion for a moment. I want to endeavor to get up a little bill that has come from the other House in regard to desertions from the Army. I believe that absolute justice and humanity require its passage.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall withdraw my motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio if the Senate is disposed to do any business.

VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS AND SEAMEN.

Mr. WADE. I think the bill to which I have called attention ought to be passed, and it can be done very soon if gentlemen believe as I do that justice and humanity require that it should be. Soldiers enlisted for three years; and when their time was up and the war was supposed to be entirely over some of the best and bravest soldiers we had in the field left the Army, supposing they had the right to go, without a formal discharge. They went home under that supposition—men who would no more have deserted than General Grant would have deserted. Some of the best and bravest men you had, under that supposition, not being regular soldiers but volunteers, not understanding the technicalities of military rule, went home, and intended no wrong by it; but they are condemned now as deserters and many of them are languishing in prison. I hope we shall take the time, at all events, to pass that little bill, which I think justice requires. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) With the consent of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the body a bill from the House of Representatives. Is there any objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When that bill is considered by the Senate, if it is within the rule of the Senate to consider it at this session at all, I desire to move an amendment proposing to repeal the provision of law passed some three or four years ago prescribing an additional punishment for the crime of desertion, affecting the citizenship of the soldier who may have left the service. That provision to which I refer has created a good deal of doubt with regard to the condition of those soldiers, some of whom, to say the least of it, deserted without any moral wrong, as is the case with the class referred to by the Senator from Ohio. I should not be willing, however, to agree to the consideration of the bill now. I did not suppose, under the rule adopted by the Senate, that a bill of that sort could be considered at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Is there objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is objection to the passage of the bill now.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator hear it read for information, to see whether there is any real objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to amend it whenever it is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will have its first reading if there be no objection. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is objection. I am opposed to the bill myself, and I did not object because I understood the Senator from Indiana to object. I do not see any reason for taking this out of the usual rule we have adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I renew my motion to take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

PETITION.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of William Hillard, of the county of Matagorda, Texas, praying to be relieved from his disabilities under the military bill, and to be restored to all the rights and privileges of a citizen; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PROPOSED REENROLLMENT OF A BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. DRAKE. I appeal to the honorable Senator from Illinois to withdraw his motion, in order that the concurrent resolution which came from the House of Representatives the other day for the reenrollment of a bill may be taken up. I beg the Senator to indulge the Senators from Missouri to this extent. I think it will take but a very few minutes to dispose of it; and it is not at all within the prohibition of the resolution of the 5th of July.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate is disposed to act upon any business, I do not wish to press the motion, and I withdraw it.

Mr. DRAKE. Let us try and see whether the Senate will be disposed to act on it. I ask that the concurrent resolution which was sent from the House of Representatives the other day, directing the reenrollment of House joint resolution No. 3, be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives which he has indicated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it can only be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope no Senator will object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not feel disposed to object except upon one ground. I do not think a measure of last session can be properly resuscitated in that way. The point that was taken the other day is entirely conclusive with me; the enrolled resolution having been sent to the President and not signed by him, and he having given his reasons for not signing it, I do not think we can, by merely reenrolling it and sending it to him again, make it a law.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Maine be so kind as to allow the matter to come before the Senate; and I think that in a few minutes we can gather the sense of the Senate one way or the other, and then we shall know how to act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The only objection I have, and that is simply this: that when it is once before the Senate the rule is broken over for the sake of doing a thing which I think cannot be legally done.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator excuse me for calling his attention to the fact that this does not break over the resolution that was adopted on the 5th instant?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator merely wishes to get an expression of the Senate on that point, whether or not taking it up would be a violation of the rule or a breaking over the rule, or a rescinding of the rule, as you may choose to call it, I shall not interpose an objection. I am willing that that point may be decided.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state to the Senator from Maine that it is a matter of exceeding interest with the Senators and Representatives from the State of Missouri that the accident which defeated the signing of a bill that was passed without dissent in both Houses, should be remedied if possible. Now, I suggest to the honorable Senator that it can hardly be considered as "legislative business" within the meaning of the resolution of the 5th of July, when all that is asked to be done is simply to effectuate that which had been previously done by the two Houses. I submit with all respect to the distinguished Senator from Maine, whether it is not a stringent interpretation of the rule which the terms of the rule will not justify, to say that we cannot perform the simplest and minutest act of legislative administration merely, and that everything is to be cut off in this way. Here we are at this moment without anything to do, propositions made upon every side to take a recess; why may we not occupy the time in attending to a little matter of this kind and let it come before the Senate, without the question of order being raised? Then let the Senate determine the point which the honorable Senator from Maine has raised; we can do it in five minutes, and we shall know then what we have to do. If we cannot resuscitate this bill, I believe there will be a unanimous disposition on the part of the Senate to pass another. I beg the honorable Senator not to interpose a question of order at this time.

Mr. HENDERSON. In order that the Senate may understand the question which is before them—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am aware of it; but in order that the Senate may understand that in all probability we are not violating the rule by taking up this question I desire to refer to the facts. On the 28th of March last the Senate passed a House joint resolution in these words:

Joint resolution placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the troops recognized in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1862, be, and are hereby, considered as placed on an equal footing with the volunteers as to bounties, and that all laws relating to bounties be applicable to them as to other volunteers.

That joint resolution was passed on the 28th, and Congress adjourned on the 30th of March. The resolution after having been enrolled was put into the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills. He laid it on his desk and neglected before the adjournment to take it to the President; but immediately after the adjournment of Congress he took it to the President, and the President made his indorsement upon the resolution:

Joint resolution placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

The first session of the Fortieth Congress adjourned on the 30th day of March, 1867. This bill, which was passed during that session, was not presented for my approval by Hon. EDMUND G. ROSS, of the Senate of the United States, and a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, until Monday, the 1st day of April, 1867, two days after the adjournment. It is not believed that the approval of any bill after the adjournment of Congress, whether presented before or after such adjournment, is authorized by the Constitution of the United States, that instrument expressly declaring that no bill shall become a law the return of which may have been prevented by the adjournment of Congress. To concede that, under the Constitution, the President, after the adjournment of Congress, may, without limitation in respect to time, exercise the power of approval, and thus determine at his discretion whether or not bills shall become laws, might subject the executive and legislative departments of the Government to influences most pernicious to correct legislation and sound public morals, and, with a single exception, occurring during the prevalence of civil war, would be contrary to the established practice of the Government from its inauguration to the present time. This bill will, therefore, be filed in the office of the Secretary of State without my approval.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1867.

The "exception" here alluded to is the act of March 4, 1863, in regard to abandoned property—

Mr. DRAKE. March 12.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was passed on the 2d of March and the President signed the bill on the 12th of March, 1863, after the adjournment of Congress. We have collected together not less than thirty or forty millions of property under that act of Congress, and the proceeds have gone into the Treasury. Mr. Lincoln signed that bill some eight or nine days after the adjournment of Congress; and it has no other validity than that. The joint resolution has neither been approved nor vetoed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to Senators that as the request is simply for unanimous consent to take up this matter, and as taking it up will not be a rescinding of the rule except so far as this particular case is concerned, I shall not object to taking it up, although I notify the Senators that it will require very considerable argument to convince me that there is power to have this bill reënrolled and resigned, without other legislative action.

Mr. DRAKE. May I inquire of the honorable Senator whether if by accident after this bill was enrolled and signed by the Presiding Officers it had been destroyed or lost it would not be competent for the two Houses to have it reënrolled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. During the session.

Mr. DRAKE. This is the same session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is contrary to all practice. There have been repeated cases—

Mr. DRAKE. Such a case never arose before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has never been one exactly like this; but there have been repeated cases where bills have been passed by both Houses and have failed by some accident to reach the President to be signed; and it has always been considered in such cases that it was necessary to legislate again.

Mr. DRAKE. That is where a bill fails to get to the President during the session; but this is the March session of Congress still. We have only taken a recess from March until July.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then he might have carried all the bills over to this time, if he pleased, and kept them in his pocket.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the matter will come up before the Senate. I am disposed to think there is a good deal in the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine; perhaps the whole question is in it. Would it not be better to let the resolution come up? It is not a proposition to legislate, and does not come within the rule. I hope the Senate will take up the subject; and if on consideration it is determined that it is necessary to introduce a new bill, the Senators from Missouri will understand exactly what course to pursue in order that the men covered by the bill may obtain their rights. It is nothing but right that the resolution should be passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was one of those who thought there was not a sufficient necessity for the present session of Congress, or for Congress to be in session at this time; and I was gratified when I saw that by a very decided vote the Senate had imposed a restraint upon its own action, and had decided to consider no question except with regard to a particular measure. It was the judgment of the Senate that however important other legislation might be it should not now be considered; that we were not here for the purpose of considering other measures, although they might address the conscience and the judgment of the Senate without a great deal of force. I dare say this is a very proper bill, and perhaps it would relieve persons now if it were passed; but that is true in regard to many other matters. This is but one of a large class of cases; and especially as it is doubtful whether the proposed measure ought to be adopted, and as our power to legislate in the form that is proposed is doubted by the distinguished Senator from Maine, in view of the whole facts, I object.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose this objection having been filed, it becomes necessary for the Senate now to determine whether this resolution falls within the rule. I am rather of the impression that this being a concurrent resolution by the two bodies and in reference to business already transacted, it is not within the rule. If it is, then a concurrent resolution to adjourn the two branches of Congress would be within that rule, and I do not see how we can adjourn without suspending the rule.

Mr. DRAKE. Let me suggest to my colleague, too—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The point of order is made, and it is for the Chair to decide now whether the case is within the rule or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri state his point of order?

Mr. HENDERSON. It was raised on the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana raised no point of order; he simply objected.

Mr. DRAKE. I would make this suggestion to my colleague, that this resolution has already been up before the Senate, taken up by unanimous consent the other day and interrupted by a motion to adjourn. ["No, no."]

Mr. HENDERSON. No; there was only a motion to take it up.

Mr. DRAKE. I thought it was before the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; my colleague is mistaken in that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. After assent is given to one measure of this kind, it will be a very ungracious thing to object to anything else that has merit in it; we shall have no ground to stand upon in doing so. Now, sir, I desire to make one suggestion at this time which may commend itself to the Senator from Missouri; it has occurred to me that after we have fixed our adjournment, when we have ascertained by conferring with the House of Representatives that we can leave at a particular time, there may not be so much objection, by unanimous consent, to waiving the resolution under which we have acted at this session, and attending to a few matters of detail that will not elicit debate, and about which there can be no difficulty. The objection I have at this time to yielding consent to taking up this measure is, that I do not know where we shall stop. If the House of Representatives agree with us that we shall adjourn at a fixed time, and we have control over that question, having received their assent, so that we know we can leave at a particular date, there will not be such mischief in doing things without objection, waiving all rules. I think, therefore, the Senator had best defer pressing this question until we ascertain when we shall adjourn, and if he can get common consent at any time, he can certainly then.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood the Chair to suggest to me to make the point of order—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair remarked that the Senator objected, but he made no point of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I objected under the rule adopted to the consideration of this business, and if the Senate will indulge me, I wish to state, on the objection, why I make my opposition. I have not been in the habit of making objection to the consideration of anything that it was the pleasure of the Senate to consider; but I esteem it now to be my public duty. The day before yesterday I received a letter from a pensioner in the State of Indiana, informing me that by mistake his bill had been passed for six dollars a month when he ought to have been pensioned for a larger sum. I sat down at once and wrote to him returning the papers, saying that the Senate had decided to consider no general business, and I thought the decision was right, and I would therefore not present his papers now; but if they were returned in December justice could be done. I acted in regard to a constituent of my own on this principle because I thought it a public duty, and I make the objection because I so feel.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not intend to ask for any legislation for my own State, but I think a liberal interpretation of this resolution with a view to its object would permit the consideration of the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. The demands for it are so pressing and so urgent that I feel bound as far as I am concerned to consider it. I hope at any rate the subject will come before the Senate and be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark to the Senate that he has heard this resolution read by its title only, and according to its title it is a concurrent resolution. A concurrent resolution cannot be legislation, and therefore the Chair thinks it is not obnoxious to the objection that it violates the rule, and hence it can be taken up by a majority vote. The Chair says this without any knowledge of the body of the resolution, judging only by the title.

Mr. DRAKE. Then my motion is in order to take it up now, I understand the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands from the title that it is a concurrent resolution, and therefore it cannot be legislation.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that anything is legislation that requires the concurrent action of the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A resolution of adjournment is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the resolution read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let us hear whether it proposes to make a law. I wish to ask this question—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I wish to make this inquiry, whether this resolution proposes to make a law.

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does this resolution merely declare that there is now a law? If it proposes to do something which will make that a law which was not before, I do not care what its form is, it is legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to state the fact that at the present session of Congress a bill which was passed at the last session before our adjournment, but was not presented to the President then, has been presented to him at this session and signed by him, and is now a law. I cannot say that it is not a law; but yet it was presented to the President at this session, though passed by Congress before the adjournment. This bill was sent to the President, and he has not vetoed it. It was given to him after our adjournment; that is, after the recess had been taken. The other bill to which I refer was not sent to him until the commencement of the present session, and he has signed it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a difference in the cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Indiana asks whether this is to give validity or to breathe the breath of life into a law. I say not, surely not. It is merely continuing control over our own action; it is to send a bill to the President.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The other bill we have nothing to do with. That was the action of the Clerk. A bill was found that had not been sent to the President; it had been enrolled and signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives at the last session, and by some agency it got at this session to the President of the United States. It was by no agency of ours. We had nothing to do with it. He sends us notice that he has signed such a bill; and that calls for no action here. Now, this calls for action here.

Mr. HENDERSON. The only question between the Senator from Maine and myself is whether this is legislating.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I do not say anything about. I only point out the difference between this case and that cited.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Gentlemen seem to be discussing this whole matter. It appears to me that the reading of the Constitution settles this question. It provides:

"If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him—"

this bill was presented to him—

"the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law."

Now, it is a law if we have been in session all the time, because it was presented to the President and he did not return it. If we were not in session, and by our adjournment prevented its return, then it is not a law. These are the words of the Constitution. Now, sir, it cannot be supposed that the President could have held all the bills of the last session for three months. During the intermediate time, from March to July, we were in session or we were not in session. Which were we? If we were in session, it is a law—he did not return it; if we were not in session, it is not a law.

Mr. HENDERSON. He has signed one bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That presents another question. If the bill was presented to him, he might sign it. Why can we not present a bill after a regular adjournment? What is the reason? I do not know anything in the Constitution that requires a bill to be taken to the President on the day it passes this body. Under our rules we can hold it for six months or till the next session of Congress before we send it to him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask whether this bill has ever been presented to the President?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The President says it has been.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, he does not say that. He says that two days after the adjournment it was presented.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was presented.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Could it be presented after Congress had adjourned? On the reasoning of the honorable Senator, I suggest that it may be presented now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is anything to prevent a bill being presented to the President after our adjournment. When it is presented to him, what is he to do? Clearly, you cannot deprive the President of his right to veto a bill by a recess extending beyond ten days. That is a constitutional right; he has a right to send it back and have the judgment of the two Houses upon it. You cannot make it a law, in case he does not return it, when he has no power to return it. It is very clear to my mind that this bill is not a law, although it is more than ten days since it was presented to the President. Why is it not a law? If it is a law, it has become a law by depriving the President of an opportunity to return it. But suppose he had signed it; would it then have been a law? That presents another question. Perhaps it would.

I am inclined to think it would have been a law if he had signed it. I can see, however, that the practice of presenting and signing bills in that way would be a very bad practice, and I hope the Congress of the United States will never fall into the practice of presenting bills to the President after Congress has adjourned. But I do not see any legal or constitutional reason why this bill would not be a law if the President had thought proper to sign it; but not having signed it, it seems to me it is not a law. It was presented to him, and if by signing it he could have made it a law, then the presentation is good; but he not having signed it, it is a dead bill, and you cannot make it an act that is passed by both Houses by this process.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator whether if this be an adjournment the officers of the Senate had a right to present that bill to the President after our adjournment, or whether that was a legal presentation of the bill to the President?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have already said that I thought the practice very bad, but I do not know any legal or constitutional reasons why we cannot present a bill to the President after adjournment, nor why he cannot, if he thinks proper, sign it. This having been presented to him, it has lost its vitality as a bill. That would be the view I should be inclined to take of it. At any rate, I hope the Senate will not act with any haste in regard to this matter. It involves very important constitutional questions, as the Senate will see by a moment's reflection. Certainly we cannot by our rules adopt any course of action which will deprive the President of his constitutional prerogative to veto.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that that clause of the Constitution which says that it shall not become a law in the event of an adjournment preventing its return is simply saying that we shall not by adjournment deprive the President of his power to send a bill back. It has no reference to a bill which he may choose to sign that has been sent to him in good season. I have no question on that subject that he may sign such a bill after we adjourn; but it does not become a law unless he does sign it, notwithstanding the expiration of the ten days after the adjournment.

Mr. HENDERSON. My idea upon this subject, from the lights now shed on it, is contained in the remarks of the Senator from Maine, that there never has been a legal presentation of this bill to the President. Now, suppose the President had never seen this bill, suppose the chairman of our committee had not taken it to him after the adjournment of the March session, what would have been the situation of the bill? Could it now by order of the Senate alone be sent to the President without the joint order of the two Houses? Could we have required the Committee on Enrolled Bills to take that bill up to the President for his signature? I think most assuredly so. If we could do that, certainly this proposed resolution does not fall within the rule we have adopted, because it is not legislation. It does not require the action of the President. It is only the control which we may properly exercise over our own proceedings, just such as a court exercises over its proceedings, over its record and over the returns of its officers. It seems to me that it is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Senate to say that this was no legal presentation of the bill, that it has never been before the President at all, and not having been presented to him it is a bill before us. Now can we not order that bill to be sent to the President? If not, the President assuredly has made a law by his signature of a bill, improperly at the present session. He certainly exercised the right to sign it and he made no objection to it because it was presented at this session, having been passed at the last.

The difficulty of this question is that this is the first session of the Fortieth Congress. It cannot be the second session. If there was an adjournment, it is the second session. If this is a session made by law it is the second session of the Fortieth Congress. But surely our proceedings are all under the head and title of the first session of the Fortieth Congress, and will go to the country as such. Then there has been a mere recess of the two Houses. We took a recess, I believe, from the 20th of last December to the 3d of January. I can show to the Senate bills that were signed by the President during that recess. There was an interval of more than ten days during which Congress was not in session. We adjourned on the 20th of December, and yet there was an act signed by the President on the 26th. Was that a law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We all think so.

Mr. HENDERSON. If it be so, why is it that we cannot take jurisdiction over this matter ourselves without the action of the House of Representatives at all? This is not a resolution to be sent to the President to give validity to the old act, but we simply ask our officer to represent, or rather to present, because the first presentation was an illegal one, and therefore without validity—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not that. It was a legal presentation on the ground that he could sign the bill and make it a law. That is exactly what the Senator has been proving. He has shown that the bill was signed during a recess.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the Senator says that this was an adjournment; he takes the ground that this was an adjournment and not a recess. If it was an adjournment, what right had the chairman of the committee to present this bill? Surely the Senator is not correct. His argument does not hang together.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator, I understand, has undertaken to prove that during the holidays bills were presented to and signed by the President.

Mr. HENDERSON. Because that was a recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, if it had been an adjournment and a bill had been presented to him and signed by him, it would have been a law.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Surely not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If a bill was presented to him and he thought proper to sign it, that made it a law, whether there was an adjournment or a recess. You cannot adjourn for more than three days at a time except by a concurrent resolution, and then it amounts to an adjournment of Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Maine calls my attention to the ninth joint rule of the two Houses in regard to the presentation of enrolled bills to the President:

"9. After a bill shall have been thus signed in each House, it shall be presented by the said committee to the President of the United States for his approbation, (it being first indorsed on the back of the roll, certifying in which House the same originated, which indorsement shall be signed by the Secretary or Clerk, as the case may be, of the House in which the same did originate,) and shall be entered on the Journal of each House. The same committee shall report the day of presentation to the President; which time shall also be carefully entered on the Journal of each House."

How can that be done unless we are in session? I cannot see.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The rule seems to imply that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Therefore it must certainly be that there has been no presentation of this bill. Now, the only question is, have we jurisdiction over this act of Congress. Have we a right to pass a simple resolution by the Senate requiring the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to present a certain bill to the President? That is the only question now before the Senate. That is not legislation, surely. There is nothing legislative in it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the resolution ought not to be concurrent.

Mr. HENDERSON. That does not injure it. I thought it need not be a concurrent resolution when the other House acted.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest to the honorable Senator from New York that the reason why it was made a concurrent resolution was in order that the Presiding Officers of the two Houses might have the warrant of this resolution for signing the reënrolled bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the resolution was called for some time ago by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.] It will now be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 8th instant:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed and directed, and is hereby instructed and directed, to reënroll House resolution No. 6 of this the Fortieth Congress, that the same may be again signed by the Presiding Officers of the Senate and the House, and be again presented to the President for his approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark that after hearing the resolution read, and seeing that it proposes to make that a law which is not now a law, he must change his ruling, and hold that it be objectionable under the resolution heretofore adopted by the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg the Chair to submit the question to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DRAKE. No, I do not appeal. I beg the Chair to submit the question to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether the resolution shall be considered, notwithstanding the resolution of the 5th of July.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question is whether it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is it in order, under the resolution of the Senate, to consider this concurrent resolution?

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 11, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENDERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. Without wishing to protract debate, I simply desire to call the attention of Senators to the exact position of the matter. It is not a question whether the Senate is in favor of this resolution or not, but the simple question is whether it is out of order or in order to act upon this particular proposition under the resolution of the 5th of July.

Mr. CONKLING. The question submitted to the Senate is whether the Senate is in favor of taking up this matter. I wish to say for one that I cannot believe this is the true way to correct the difficulty; but I understand that we are called to vote now upon the simple question whether this resolution, which is merely concurrent and which I think need not have been even concurrent, and which I conceive to be only an order of the Senate and of the House acting upon their officers, is legislative business or not. Whatever may be the form of the question, that is the substance on which I for one feel bound to vote. I do not see in what sense it is legislative any more than would be an order of the Senate directing one of its ministers to do any other act. It is not the making of a law. Although, as I say, I do not believe this is the true way to cure the difficulty, and I do not believe it is competent to resuscitate this law in this way, yet on the mere question of taking up the resolution, I feel bound to vote in the affirmative, because I do not believe it is legislative business, and therefore not within the rule lately adopted by the Senate.

Mr. ROSS. I cannot see how this resolution can be objectionable under the rule which has been adopted by the Senate. As has been suggested, it is simply a direction to the Clerks of the two bodies to perform a clerical duty. It is no more making a law than is the direction to perform any other clerical duty. The law, in my judgment, exists; or the bill is in existence. There has been no legal presentation of it to the President. I think that is evident from the discussion we have had to-day; and under the peculiar circumstances of the case I trust the Senate will take this view of it and permit the subject to be acted on.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire how many kinds of business we have in this body. Is it not executive business that is proposed to be done? If it is not executive—

Mr. POMEROY. It is clerical.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that there was any such business.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose the President of the Senate signs an enrolled bill and announces it publicly in the session of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know what sort of business this is. My friend from New York says it is not legislative, and I suppose it is not executive. If it has any other designation, I do not know what to call it.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator from Illinois does not mean to instruct us that all business that we do which is not legislative must be executive, that these are the only two kinds of business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What other business is there?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean that every resolution or order that the Senate makes is legislative business? Suppose the Senate should pass a resolution that they would dispense with the services of a chaplain to-morrow morning, and not require him to make a prayer; would that be legislative business?

Mr. TRUMBULL. What sort of business is it?

Mr. CONKLING. Legislative business I conceive to be that business which pertains to the making of a law, a law being a public rule of action, which must be adopted by both Houses with the concurrence of the Executive. Whatever goes to that, whatever goes to the function of law-making, is legislative business; but whatever pertains to the direction of our own officers is not necessarily legislative business. Suppose we direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to employ three more pages than are here, or to dispense with three pages, is that legislative business? Suppose we direct the Clerk to make a certain entry on the Journal, is that legislative business? And yet all this is done by an order or resolution of the Senate. I heard it said here the other day that votes of thanks to officers were legislative in their character, and the reason assigned was that they were joint resolutions and the President must sign them; and Senators said they went into the statute-book, in a place by themselves to be sure, but still were treated in a quasi sense as laws. That may be so; that, if you please, is a border case; but the idea that every utterance of the Senate in the nature of an order directed to one of the ministers of the Senate is necessarily legislative I must say I cannot consent to, even upon authority so high as that of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question for the Senate is whether it is in order to take up for consideration the resolution mentioned, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Norton, Nye, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wade—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Guthrie, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Williams, and Yates—23.

So the resolution was held not to be in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now move that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not; and I desire to make a statement. A gentleman came in from the House a short time ago, who told me that a distinguished member of the House assured him that the vote would probably be taken within an hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are calling the yeas and nays now, but they may have to take them once or twice more.

Mr. SUMNER. I received that information about half an hour ago; and I suggest that we sit here to receive the bill and order it to be printed. I understand that there are five sections, and it seems to me we ought not to act, and for one I should object to proceeding with it until I can see it in print. I think it is too important a matter for us to undertake to shoot flying. I think, therefore, we had better proceed a little while longer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that I was informed very directly, as the Senator from Massachusetts was, that in fifteen minutes we should have the bill here. That was about three quarters of an hour ago. About twenty-five minutes ago, nearly half an hour, another gentleman came over and said they were about ready to vote, and he thought we should get the bill here in an hour. I have not the slightest idea that we shall get the bill here for any action before half past seven o'clock. We may as well go and get our dinners, and come back then and see what we can do with it, either act on it or print it, as the Senator from Massachusetts desires. We can then determine what to do with it; at any rate we can do no good by staying here now.

Mr. SUMNER. We cannot proceed with it to-night. I appeal to the Senator would it be right for us now to act on five sections?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose there will be any five sections. The Senator assumes that. The amendments may be merely verbal. I have no such information as that, and the Senator cannot have.

Mr. SUMNER. My information is that there are five sections that have been incorporated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have they been agreed to?

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe they are mainly amendments that the Senator from Massachusetts offered here, and we shall have no trouble with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend that by saying eight o'clock. It will be a little cooler then.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the motion by naming six o'clock.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; and at five minutes past four o'clock the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. SUMNER. Is there any business before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I would ask the Senate if they can do anything better than proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 115?

Mr. HARLAN. Before that is taken up I have a little resolution to offer, that will not, I think, lead to any debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I give way, but with great reluctance. This is an important measure.

REVISION OF DISTRICT LAWS.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, in the prosecution of the revision of the laws of said District, as provided by Senate resolution of 2d April, 1867, have leave to sit during the recess of Congress.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 115; and if there is any objection to it I should like to hear it.

Mr. GRIMES. Give us the title of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. That can be given from the desk.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the title of the bill that I propose to take up read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 115) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government, by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, if that should be passed unanimously to-night, it would put the cap-stone on the reconstruction act, and the Senate might go home in peace and expect peace throughout the country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume my friend from Massachusetts is not serious in asking to call up that bill to-night, and with his permission I propose that we take up the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not intend to antagonize my bill with that, because they are entirely in harmony. The one is the natural sequence of the other. You cannot pass the one if you are reasonable Senators, as of course you are, without passing the other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us take up the message from the House first, at any rate.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. Pass the House bill, and then take up mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the message from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment to House bill No. 123. The first amendment was to strike out the first section of the Senate amendment, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That it is hereby declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act of the 2d day of March, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and of the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, that the governments then existing in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were illegal; and that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts, and to the authority of Congress.

The next amendment was to strike out in lines three and four of section two the words "subject to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States;" and in lines seventeen and eighteen to strike out the words "subject to the approval of the General aforesaid" and to add to the section these words:

And to fill vacancies occasioned by death or resignation; and the district commander, whenever he shall deem it necessary, shall have power to set aside, suspend, or affirm any act or proceeding of any State government, or any municipal, or other division thereof, or any act or thing done under or by virtue of its authority.

The next amendment was in section three, after the word "appointment" in line three, to insert "removal."

The next amendment was to add to section four:

And it shall be the duty of such commander to remove from office, as aforesaid, all persons who are disloyal to the Government of the United States, or who use their official influence in any manner to hinder, delay, or obstruct the due and proper administration of this act and the acts to which it is supplementary.

The next amendment was in section five, to strike out from the word "before" in line ten to the word "act" in line fourteen, inclusive, and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out "to admit to registration only such persons as they may deem entitled to be registered by the acts aforesaid."

The next amendment was in section five, to strike out all after the word "registration," in line twenty-two, to the word "provided" in line twenty-nine.

The next amendment was in section six, line seventeen, to strike out the words "the general laws," and in lieu thereof insert "any general law."

The next amendment was to add to section six "or for the administration of justice, or for the keeping of the public peace."

The next amendment was in section seven, line eight, to strike out the word "twenty" and insert "fourteen."

The next amendment was to add after section eight the following section:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That no civil court of the United States, or of any State, shall have jurisdiction of any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, against any such district commander or any officer or person acting by his authority, for or on account of the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this act or the acts to which it is supplementary.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no district commander shall be relieved from the command assigned to him under the aforesaid acts, unless by order of the General of the Army of the United States, or unless the Senate shall have first advised and consented thereto, or unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered and dismissed from the Army, or in arrest for an offense punishable by dismissal from the Army, or disqualified by sickness for the performance of his duties.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall prevent or attempt to prevent or obstruct the execution of this act or either of the acts to which it is supplementary, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned one year, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not extend to or include any offense or offenses of which the military authorities may have or take jurisdiction under the provisions of this act or the acts to which it is supplementary.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all members of said boards of registration, and all persons holding office in said military districts under State or municipal authority, or by detail or appointment of the district commanders, shall be required to take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That no district commander or member of the board of registration, or any of the officers or appointees acting under them, shall be bound in his action by any opinion of any officer of the United States.

The next amendment was to change section nine to section fourteen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are two courses, I think, which we might pursue with these amendments. There are, I think, some eight or ten of them; I did not keep the precise count. I am sure, from looking over them carefully—at least that is my own opinion, and I think from the indications in the Senate it would be the opinion of the Senate—that there are some of those amendments that the Senate never would agree to. There are some of them that I could not vote for. There are a number of them and probably a majority of them that I think the Senate could agree to without any departure from the principles upon which it has been acting. Now, the bill may either be referred to the committee, that it may examine and report such amendments as in its opinion ought to be agreed to, and we could act upon them separately and agree, as far as it is in the power of the Senate to agree, to the amendments of the House, or we can disagree to all the amendments and let it go in the first instance to the committee of conference. I think one course or the other had better be adopted; but as I myself never was very partial to these committees of conference, and think it better the whole body should act on important bills of this kind, and they can act on each amendment by itself rather than be forced to vote on the whole report of a committee of conference. I will move, rather as my own judgment in the matter than as knowing whether it will meet the view of the Senate or not, to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this course will not be pursued. I think it will keep us here a long while. These are very plain and simple propositions, and I think most of them we can concur in at once and send the bill back to the House and then have a conference on the disagreeing votes. I do not think there are more than one or two of the House propositions which the Senate will not concur in. They are very simple propositions and I think generally improvements on our bill. I hope we shall proceed now and act on these amendments, concur in what we can, and then send the others to the House, and perhaps the House will recede; if not, they may propose a committee of conference and then we can have one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope this matter will not be sent to the Judiciary Committee again. It will be noticed that there is no new proposition in these amendments of the House; they are all ideas which were distinctly contained in the House bill which was sent to us; they are all ideas which have been in some form or other, almost all of them, and I do not know but all, presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] as amendments to the bill of the Senate, which we finally adopted as an amendment to the House bill. They have all had the consideration of this body. They have had its judgment in votes adverse to agreeing to them. Now, it seems to me that the plainest and shortest way is to disagree to the whole of these amendments in a body, and ask of the House of Representatives a conference in the usual way, that we may harmonize our views. It is useless to take up the time of the Senate in agreeing to a half dozen of these amendments that are merely phraseological, so to speak, because they are perfectly trifling; they mean the same thing that the bill means now, and they can be agreed to in a conference and harmonize, or still better phraseology substituted without the least difficulty. Everybody understands that; while if we agree to them now in the haste of a present consideration, they are taken away from the consideration of a committee of conference entirely, and if a conference should perceive that some better phraseology still or some modification ought to be adopted, it is entirely out of their power. Hence, it appears to me to be very plain, inasmuch as there is nothing new in these differences between the two Houses. It is the same old question; the same old ideas presented. We had better follow the usual and straightforward course of disagreeing in a body and having a conference. I think it had better not be sent to the Judiciary Committee again.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say to the Senate that I have no sort of feeling about this as to which course is adopted. Legislation by committees of conference has always seemed very objectionable to me, because the report of such a committee has to be taken as a whole or rejected as a whole; there is no opportunity to amend it or change it in any way. But this bill, as the Senator from Vermont properly remarks, has had the consideration of both Houses now; we have considered most of the provisions that are added as amendments by the House to our amendment; they were mostly in the original House bill; and if the Senate think it the more expeditious to proceed to send it to a committee of conference, I have no objection, although my own preference, I confess, is to mature a bill by the body where there can be an opportunity to act separately upon the amendments of the other House and agree to all that we can agree to; and after that of course a conference would be useless, because there would be nothing to confer about. When the Senate has considered every one of the House amendments, and deliberately decide that it cannot agree to them, it would be of no use to appoint a committee that would have nothing to yield; and if a committee of conference is to be had, I suppose we may as well have it now and consider all these amendments together. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] says that there is nothing to trade about; but it is the very business of a committee of conference to harmonize by giving and taking and arranging the differences between the two Houses. It is a mode of legislation I am not partial to; but if the Senate think proper to send it to a committee of conference, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, it will be entirely agreeable to me. I made the other motion as an individual, preferring that course of proceeding upon this and all other general bills. I do not know which motion has preference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer, I believe, has precedence.

Mr. SUMNER. This is one of the most important measures that could be brought before Congress; it is one of the most important that has ever been brought before Congress; it ought to be considered, therefore, in such a way as to secure for it the most careful attention, and if that can be accomplished in one way rather than in another that way ought to be adopted. Now, if by proceeding with each proposition in full Senate we can act upon them all successively, I think upon the whole that would be the most advisable. It seems to me that in that way we should secure what the old lawyers and judges always required, the aggregatio mentum; the bringing of minds together, which I take it is the object we have to seek. We wish to bring every one of these propositions, if possible, before every Senator; but if Senators are not disposed to take up these different propositions one by one and sift them successively, then I think it would be better for it to go to our committee, who should go through the sifting process and make us a report that we may on their report have an opportunity of doing that.

But I would observe that I do not think any care, any attention, any time that we can give to this will be misplaced. It is too important for us to allow any question of time to interfere with what our best judgment shall think the best course of proceeding. In order to determine what that best course is, I would put ourselves back in the middle of a long session when we had weeks and months before us, and I would ask then what we should do with a bill like this. I would do the same now if it took hours, days, weeks, for our main object should be to perfect the bill.

With these ideas my first suggestion would be that the Senate should proceed with these different propositions one by one, seriatim, and see if we cannot dispose of them, or if I may so express myself, eliminate one after the other, and if we cannot succeed in that, we may ask the assistance of one of our own committees or may refer it all to a committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Illinois does not like committees of conference. I think, with his explanation of what a committee of conference is to do, he ought not to like them; he thinks they are to trade. I do not think committees of conference are appointed to trade. I think committees of conference are appointed for a higher purpose than that. Clearly all these amendments are of the simplest character. We do not know whether we agree with the House or not. Suppose we go on now and act on the amendments, agree to what we can, and refer the rest to a committee of conference. It seems to me that is the fair course, but if we are not to take them up in that way, I prefer that they should go to a committee of conference now rather than to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose it will be in order after the Senate shall have acted upon these proposed amendments, and adopted part of them, and disagreed to part of them, to have a committee of conference on those that we do disagree to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course that would be in order.

Mr. DRAKE. Would a motion now be in order to proceed to the consideration of these amendments seriatim?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to refer them to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope that motion will not prevail, but that the Senate will proceed to act upon the amendments seriatim, find what they can agree to and what they cannot agree to, and send the bill back to the House.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope that this subject will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me that the best way to arrive at a conclusion is to refer the subject directly to a committee of conference now. If they cannot agree, then we can come back here and take up these amendments seriatim, and legislate in reference to them.

Mr. GRIMES. I have precisely the same objections to the conduct of some committees of conference that the Senator from Illinois has; that is to say, I object to the plan that is sometimes adopted of a committee of conference agreeing to an entire new measure or to provisions that have not been considered by either House of Congress, as is sometimes the case; but I apprehend that this committee of conference, with the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, at the head of it, who has such a strong repugnance to any such course, will not do anything objectionable. If we want to get through with the business of this session the right way is to submit this whole bill as it now stands to a committee of conference. There is not a single proposition, we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts and by the Senator from Illinois, that has not in some form or other been before both the Senate and the House. We have our opinions already made up upon them; there is nothing new in them; and if we adopt the course that has been proposed of considering some of these amendments now, we shall find that we have got in the end to seek the aid of a committee of conference, and the matter will go over until next week.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts who first addressed the Senate on this subject, that the question of time in the sense of our own convenience is a very paltry question, if it be one at all which enters into this subject; and I wish to say for one that the heat of the weather and the personal inconvenience of this particular season of the year has never entered into the judgment which I have formed of the wise duration of this session. I say this now because I have heard it stated here by implication a good many times that almost all of us, excepting the gentleman who took pains to disclaim it, were not thinking of much here except how hot we were or whether we were hot or not. I want to say for one that if the mercury could be graduated anywhere which might be measured exactly by instruments, my judgment as to the propriety of the length of this session and as to the correct mode of disposing of this measure would, unless I deceive myself, be precisely what it is now; and therefore I must say that I do not feel in need of any admonition or advice from anybody to see to it that I do not allow my sensation of warmth or cold to confuse or warp my judgment during this session.

Now, sir, there is among these amendments a very important one in principle and in character. It will seem practically very important to the country. It is that amendment which binds the President hand and foot as to the displacement of these commanders. There are in the country a great many discerning persons who believe that, legislate as we may, this acting President of the United States, fatally bent on mischief as they think he is, retaining the power to put out men who efficiently and earnestly will execute this law and replace them with those who will pervert and paralyze it, will have at last the power to defeat it all. The views of those who thus think and thus fear are embodied in a measure in one of these amendments which makes the power of removal hinge upon some one of three things: first, the assent of this body; or second, the assent of the General of the Army; or third, the judgment and sentence of a military court. Now, I surmise there are those who think that such a provision comes so near deposing the President of the United States in his character of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, that they would feel bound to resist the provision. Here, then, is an issue distinct and important which as it stands now is made between the two Houses; and I beg leave, although that is aside from the purpose with which I rose, to say that important as it is, important as it seems to me at least to be, to guard as far as constitutionally we can guard against interference by the President with these commanders, it is no more important than it is to guard against the same interference with the commanders of other military districts.

I do not know what may be the views of Senators as to the distinctions to be made between the power that we have in the district to which Georgia belongs and the military division to which Tennessee and Kentucky belongs; but I think I can see this: that if these five generals commanding districts in the far South are secured in their places, and when that is done, if a fair election should be overturned and prevented in the State of Tennessee by the removal of the commander of that district and his replacement by one who would prevent a fair election by military force—if that should happen, those who have devoted themselves to the discussion of this question and have confined it to those five military districts would be in the condition of that celebrated man who was hoist with his petard; and my impression is, that if any provision is to be put into the bill on that subject, it ought to extend, if it is constitutional at all and constitutionally can be extended, at least so far as to guard the case which I have suggested.

I was going, however, to say that this amendment is no doubt one of those to which the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary referred when he said he believed there were those to which the Senate could not and would not assent, and he must have had in his mind other amendments also, for he spoke in the plural. If that be so—and I agree with the chairman in the view he has on that subject—it is very clear that sooner or later we come to a conference committee; and what is there in any aspect to be gained by taking up those amendments, which, because they are verbal, or because they are inconsequential, or for some other reason we might, and probably could and would agree to, and come at last to the same thing, with the same delay, the same chances of ultimate difference which would exist to-night were we to refer the whole question now?

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts who was last up that a conference committee is not a committee made to trade; I believe that was the word which he made use of; but, as everybody knows, a conference committee is a piece of machinery arranged upon the theory of giving and taking, upon the theory of concession and compromise, upon the theory of surrendering on both sides whatever is deemed not vital and a proper subject of surrender, to the end that all sides may insist upon that which is deemed indispensable. In that view we all know that this bill precisely as it stands now is in a better condition than it can ever assume again in its subsequent parliamentary stages to go, if it is to go at all, to a committee of conference. And while as I say I agree with the Senator who goes furthest that time as a matter of convenience is not important, yet the practical, expeditious, straightforward, safe mode is the true mode; and I submit to the Senate that while you sit here to-night, to-morrow, and to-morrow night, and vote no matter how long upon those things which are not going to divide the two Houses, in place of advancing, we retrograde, because we are absolutely depriving the committee of conference, to which ultimately we look, of the very means of bringing the two Houses together. For one I hope we shall disagree, pro formâ, in bulk to all of these amendments, and let them all go to a committee in the hope that they may be arranged.

Mr. SUMNER. I have listened to these remarks of my friend from New York with absolute pain; I am sorry that such a speech has been made in the Senate. Here is an open suggestion that we are to trade off one proposition for another in a committee of conference. That is the practical result of his statement and of his argument. I protest with my whole soul, with every fibre of my body, with every sentiment of my heart, against any such suggestion. It is not constitutional. I hope I shall not have the suggestion thrown out to me that I stand alone when I say that such a suggestion is not constitutional. I say it is not constitutional that we should go into a committee of conference in order to trade off one truth against another truth, one principle against another principle, one proposition against another proposition. No, sir, we go into a committee of conference for a better purpose. It is for a comparison of judgments, as I said a moment ago, for what the old lawyers called an aggregation of minds, not for a trading of principles.

Now the aggregations of minds is to be on those points where there is a difference. If there is no difference in question, then there is no occasion of question; but when the difference occurs, there is the question and there is the occasion for the committee of conference. The committee of conference should meet, and each side should state its views as strongly as it can, and then it is to be trusted that one will recede. If there is a recession on either side, then there may be some alternative proposition as a substitute for that special proposition. But, in the name of the Constitution of my country, do not let us trade one proposition against another. I object to it. I say it is unconstitutional, and it is unconstitutional precisely as I said the other day your proposition was unconstitutional, because it was irrational and unjust. I know Senators objected to my use of that language; but the language still lives, and the occasion for it lives. I hope that we shall not go into any committee of conference with any such purpose. Let us go there sincerely and simply in order to meet our colleagues of the other House with a view to arrive at an agreement on those points on which there is a real difference; but if there is no real difference between us on any particular points, let us then at once withdraw our opposition, and raise no question except where there is a difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 20.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be done. I hope that the Senate will take up the different propositions and will proceed with them one by one, and when we have arrived at any point on which we cannot agree, that with regard to that we shall ask for a committee of conference. It seems to me that is the honest proceeding, and here in the Senate as elsewhere I am satisfied that honesty is the best policy.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the other course dishonest?

Mr. SUMNER. If it is with an idea that we are to abandon one proposition as a consideration for an abandonment on the other side, I do not think it honest. That is the way it strikes me. I do not think it constitutional. I think that the true way is to meet each question by itself and bring the best mind of the Senate and of the House to bear upon it, not to trade off one proposition against another.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly do not desire to do anything either now or hereafter that will be regarded by the country or suspected by myself to be dishonest; but I desire to get through with this measure. I am not prepared to say, from the reading by the Clerk of these amendments, that I understand them all; but if I am not mistaken, there is no principle enunciated in these amendments that we did not discuss during the preparation of the bill that has gone to the House of Representatives and been amended and sent back. I am satisfied that almost every one of the propositions sent to us from the House has been considered more or less by the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to take up each one of the propositions and go over that discussion once more. I have not participated in the discussion heretofore, and I do not desire to do so now. The Senator from Massachusetts and others have spent a good deal of time in the discussion of the principles involved in the amendments; I myself have made up my mind in reference to all of them, and I sincerely hope that the Senate will adopt the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont.

I desire to see a good bill; I desire to see something done which will satisfy the country, and which will carry out in the spirit of the original bills the policy that we have adopted; but I cannot see that that end will not be secured by acceding now to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, and I hope the Senate will adopt it and send the bill to a committee of conference. The gentlemen who will be selected will understand what the Senate has already decided. We have discussed these propositions and come to a vote upon them; and the three gentlemen who will be selected will certainly understand the feelings and the views of the Senate. I do not understand that they must necessarily give up a principle or that they must barter truth, that they must give up anything that is of substantial importance. If a committee of conference in this case is to barter away principle and truth, why is it not so in every other case of committees of conference? If a committee of conference is unconstitutional in this case, why is it not equally unconstitutional in every other case? We have resorted to committees of conference ever since I have been here, and at the close of a session almost every bill is sent to a committee of conference to perfect, and indeed it seems to me that without such committees we are utterly unable to perfect legislation.

Now, what is the use of discussing these amendments that are merely questions of phraseology, going over the entire week's work again and accomplishing nothing at all, and at last submitting the questions, if there be questions of difference between the two Houses, to a committee of conference? It is a waste of time in my judgment. I can see no question of honesty or dishonesty about it, and I hope that we shall adopt this plan and pass the bill to-morrow and send it to the President, or pass it to-night if the committees can agree to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate having decided not to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to say a word, lest my former remarks may be misunderstood. When I said that I supposed the Senate could agree to some of these amendments—there are twelve or fifteen of them in all—I did not mean to be understood as saying that I supposed the Senate would prefer them. There are several proposed amendments here which I would be willing to assent to because the House of Representatives insists upon them, which I do not think improve the bill at all. There are not more than two which I regard as improvements of the bill. Several others I would agree to for the purpose of harmonizing with the House, not thinking them very essential or important; and it is only in that sense I presume that a committee of conference could act—not by way of trading away anything that was deemed essential by the Senate in the bill. While I would be willing to vote in the Senate or to act in a committee of conference so as to endeavor to harmonize the two Houses, and would give up anything which did not seem to be essential or involve some principle, I should not think that in doing so I was acting improperly or trading away anything that the Senate ought to insist upon.

I am satisfied myself, as the Senate has thought proper not to refer the bill with the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, that the most expeditious way would be to refer it at once to a committee of conference, because, as I have just remarked, I shall vote against concurring with the House in several of these amendments if a distinct proposition is made here whether we shall agree to concur with the House or not, unless we are going to succeed or there is a probability of our succeeding in harmonizing. If there was, then I would give up certain things, I would consent to certain amendments, but it would be with the view to bring about harmony when I thought that by assenting to them I was not materially injuring the effect of the bill. I think the better course will be, therefore, and the most expeditious course, for the Senate to agree to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, for if the bill has to go to a committee of conference—and I consider that the Senate has decided that by deciding not to refer it to the Judiciary Committee—it may as well go now as after spending the night upon these amendments, some of which I am sure the Senate would not agree to if left simply to act without any reference to harmonizing with the other House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There perhaps would be one mode more expeditious than that suggested by the Senator from Illinois, and that would be to refer this bill to be decided upon to the Presiding Officer of this body and the Presiding Officer of the House. If expedition is what is desired, that perhaps would be the most expeditious, because reducing the number to two would be excluding the possibility of so great a difference of opinion. Three representing the Senate and three representing the House may disagree; perhaps two agreeing in opinions in regard to this policy would not disagree at all. This is making legislation easy. The Senator says it is the most expeditious mode. What is the occasion for expedition? I did not want to hear myself at this time; I did not hurry to get here; but I am here now and ready to discharge my duties according to my own judgment; and I think the question of expedition, dispatch of this business, is not to be considered.

Now, Mr. President, there having come from the House, as I understand, five additional sections to this bill, what is the reason that in the course of deliberation in this body I am not to have the privilege of discussing these sections, section by section, according to the usages of the Senate, and of voting upon each? What is the reason that I am to be cut off from the right as a Senator to propose amendments to the amendments of the House?

Mr. SUMNER. And allow me to suggest, to see them all in print, too?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, there would be some comfort in that. [Laughter.] A man would have some assurance at least that he understood himself the subject he was talking about and voting upon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The additional sections are the sections that were in the original House bill very nearly. I am not sure but there is perhaps one or two besides that we have had in print before us.

Mr. SUMNER. They are different.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very nearly the same; and I was going to make another suggestion, that there is an amendment to an amendment pending, and the Senator from Indiana could offer but one amendment to it; we cannot make several amendments as I understand; it would be only in order to offer one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am obliged to the Senator from Illinois for one suggestion. He says the House bill has been before the Senate and these additional five sections were in the House bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Substantially.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And we acted upon the House bill. Now, how fair is that answer? Let the Senator turn back to the proceedings of yesterday, controlled by himself, and answer me whether the Senate has ever considered the House bill. The Senate took up the Senate bill, went through with it section by section, agreed upon amendments, and after the bill had been considered in Committee of the Whole, came back into the Senate and was ready to be voted upon, the last word of debate had been uttered, the last amendment proposed; the Senator from Illinois then moved to take up the House bill, and offered as a substitute for the House bill the entire Senate bill as perfected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Indiana had noticed, quite a number of the amendments which were offered to the Senate bill which was pending were exact copies of sections of the House bill. I think we had yea and nay votes upon several of them; I know they were offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; the very same sections that you now find are added by these amendments. The Senator from Vermont, who observed more closely than I did, thinks he offered all of them; I was not sure of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All of those that differed from our bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a change of ground, with entire respect to the Senator from Illinois. I was answering the suggestion made by the Senator that we had considered the House bill and that these sections are parts of that House bill. Now, we did not consider the House bill. We went so far yesterday as to amend the House bill by striking out all after the enacting clause without reading the House bill, and as I now recollect, the House bill never was read in this body. So the answer of the Senator lacks all force when he claims that the House bill was considered at all. What were offered in the course of debate as amendments in the Senate to the Senate bill, I do not now choose to consider. The Senate agreed to certain amendments of its own bill, and disagreed to propositions that came from different Senators. Whether Senators proposed what now comes from the House, I do not choose now to judge. It is not printed; we have not had an opportunity of examining carefully what has come from the House; what is the language used in the House amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? I wish to inquire for my own information in all sincerity, whether my friend from Indiana prefers the House bill to the Senate bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not prepared to express any opinion as to the merits or demerits of the House amendments. The House bill has never been read in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Twice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not while we have been considering the Senate bill. It might have been read before we took up the Senate bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The House bill was read twice at full length in the Senate, and all those portions of the House bill which differed from the Senate bill were, I believe, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and every one of them was voted on separately.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what the Senator from Illinois stated. Does the Senator from Rhode Island know that the precise propositions that now come from the House as amendments to the Senate bill as the Senate passed it, agree exactly with the amendments that were proposed in the Senate? The Senator from Rhode Island has stated that the amendments proposed by the House now, which we ought to consider, in my judgment, were proposed in the Senate, debated, and voted upon. I want to know from the Senator from Rhode Island whether he knows that the amendments now coming from the House agree in sentiment and phraseology with the amendments that were proposed in the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator wish me to answer?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot say that they are in totidem verbis, because I only listened to them as they were read from the Clerk's desk; but they struck me as being in substance the same. I recognized the same propositions I had been voting against all day yesterday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator one question. I understand the House has amended the text of the Senate bill. Were those amendments to the Senate bill proposed and debated in the Senate?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand that the House has amended the text of the Senate bill except to correct some inaccuracies. There was an omission in the third section, a mistake on the part of the Senate which the House has corrected. I presume that amendment would be accepted unanimously by the Senate. I have not of course read the bill with that accuracy which would enable me to answer the questions of the Senator from Indiana; but I feel confident that the differences between the House bill and the Senate bill have been substantially acted upon and voted upon in the Senate, and the House bill has been read in the Senate twice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In a measure of this sort the very language is important, especially when Congress is now in session, because the language in the legislation of the last session became a matter of controversy. Now the Senator is not able to say that these amendments are just the amendments that were proposed in the Senate. I suppose no Senator does know.

Mr. President, I will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Vermont. I do not like either the Senate bill or the House bill, and do not expect to vote for either; but I expect conscientiously to vote for whatever I think will make the measure less objectionable, and vote against whatever I believe will make the bill more objectionable. As to weighing propositions, neither of which commands the approval of my judgment and conscience, in the presence of the Senate I do not choose to it. I think they are both bad, and I will vote against either and feel that I am doing my duty to the country in doing so. That is all the answer upon that subject.

Mr. President, I think that each Senator ought to have the privilege of proposing amendments to the amendments of the House. There are five sections, original sections. Those sections should be considered, and amendments should be proposed, and it should not be left to any three Senators to control the judgment of this body. What shall be the character of the bill that will come to us from the committee of conference will depend altogether upon the pleasure of the Presiding Officer of this body and of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it will depend upon our pleasure whether we agree to the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In part, but their report is not amendable; their report is not divisible; the Senate has but very little control over it. It is, then, a question of the defeat of the bill entirely or an agreement to their report entirely. The Senate is tied from the time a report is made. There is no use of talking about free, intelligent legislation, when we submit a question to a committee of conference. You can reject the report, but when you reject the report you reject the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to say that we do not. We can reject the report and agree to a further conference and suit ourselves at last to the views both of the Senator from Indiana and my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What are the disagreements now between the Senate and the House? Five sections come from the House, and the will and pleasure of the Senate has not been expressed upon either one in the shape they come here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the substantial shape they come it has been.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There are five new sections and Senators assume that there is a disagreement upon all of them; and yet the Senator from Illinois says there are two amendments that he thinks improve the bill. I might think so; I do not know to what amendments he refers; but there may be a majority of the Senate who think that those amendments improve the bill. Then why can we and why ought we to say that there is a disagreement in regard to those two? As far as the action of the House has improved the bill, the Senate ought to say so, and where the House has made the bill worse, the Senate ought to say so, and then we arrive at the disagreement; and until we reach that point in open, free, fair discussion and propositions of amendment, I think we are not in a condition to send the bill to a committee of conference.

Mr. President, I think the practice of legislating through committees of conference is not to be indulged in except when it becomes a necessity. It is a necessary evil where laws are the work of two separate branches of the Legislature. They must be; I admit that; but I have seen this practice carried, as I think, to a vicious extent. I think they are scarcely applicable upon a bill like this. An appropriation bill is pending between the two Houses; the question is whether $100,000 more or $100,000 less shall go to a particular object; or whether an appropriation shall go to a particular object at all or not; scarcely ever a question of principle, a question reaching down to the foundations of government. There we may indulge in the practice of settling what seems to be a difference of opinion by committees of conference; but when we have got to settle questions like this, I think they ought to be settled in open Senate and in the open House, after full discussion and full opportunities to propose amendments. The Senate and the House are not free to legislate as they please when a bill has been once sent to a committee of conference, it has gone then beyond the point of amendment. A measure may be agreeable to the body, but not in the shape presented, and yet we cannot correct the evil.

My purpose in rising was simply to protest against the proposed reference. I think this bill ought to be considered in open Senate. I am as desirous for an adjournment, I suppose, as any Senator here. I was, perhaps, as reluctant to come here as any Senator; but when we are here I do not propose that the fate of a large part of this country—ten States of the Union—shall be submitted, by my vote, to the judgment of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives. When this thing is done it ought to be done in open Senate and in open House, after full debate and free amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Indiana is perfectly consistent. He is opposed to the Senate bill; he is opposed to the House bill; and therefore he is opposed to a committee of conference, which is the only mode by which we shall have any bill. If the Senate insists upon its amendment, and will give up nothing, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, will not trade, and the House insists on its propositions and will give up nothing, we shall have no legislation on this subject and we shall have to adjourn and go home without passing any bill, which is precisely what the Senator from Indiana desires; and so from his point of view he is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore being authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, Messrs. TRUMBULL, EDMUNDS, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 127) in relation to additional bounty, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

APPROPRIATION FOR RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 184) making an appropriation for the execution of the laws providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. Let the bill be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which proposes to appropriate $1,648,277 for the purpose indicated.

Mr. WILSON. The amount named in the bill is what is estimated for by the War Department as necessary to carry the several acts into effect; and if there be no objection I should like to have the bill put on its passage now; if there is objection it can go over until to-morrow. I will simply say it is necessary to have this appropriation made at this session. The amount appropriated last session was $500,000, and it has been more than expended now. Money has been temporarily used from other appropriations to the amount of $200,000 to $300,000.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not desire to make an objection to the progress of this bill, but I desire to be within reach to-morrow on its final passage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from Massachusetts will allow me to suggest that it is not safe to establish a precedent by which a bill of that kind is to be passed on a simple statement that a certain amount is the estimate. The details of the estimate should be shown; we should know how the estimate is made up and of what items it consists.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I was going to add, before such a bill is put on its final passage, I shall feel it my duty to call for a statement of the estimates from the War Department and the reasons why so large a sum of money is demanded from the public Treasury, and I also desire some explanation of our former action on this subject.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that if anybody objects I am willing to let the bill go over until to-morrow morning, when we can have the estimates here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the rule.

SUFFRAGE FOR COLORED CITIZENS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 115.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the bill in extenso.

The Chief Clerk read the title as follows:

A bill (S. No. 115) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guaranteeing a republican form of government, by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration. Is there objection?

Several SENATORS. I object.

Mr. CONKLING. I want it read for information.

Mr. SUMNER. It is good reading.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I raise the question of order that it is inhibited by the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All these questions of order arising under that rule the Chair will submit to the Senate. The question is, Is it in order under the late rule adopted by the Senate to take up this bill for consideration?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And in that connection I ask that the rule be again read. It expressly prohibits it.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution adopted on the 5th instant.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the Chair refers that question to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I should like to make one remark. I insist that this bill comes clearly, plainly, obviously within the language of the rule adopted by the Senate. By that rule legislation is confined to removing obstructions to our existing acts of reconstruction and the carrying those acts forward without introducing new matter. Now, I insist that the bill before you is precisely of that character. You have already by act of Congress given suffrage to colored persons in the rebel States. It is under your reconstruction acts that you have done it. Senators smile or laugh even, as if it had not been done. Does my friend from Maryland doubt the validity of those acts?

Mr. JOHNSON. I laughed because the honorable Senator himself laughed. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I was laughing because I saw the honorable Senator from Maryland laugh.

My argument is precisely this, and I ask the attention of my honorable friend from Maryland to this as a lawyer. We all know his eminence at the bar of the Supreme Court; he has no superior; and I submit to him this: we have already by our reconstruction acts conferred the suffrage upon colored persons in the rebel States; now, is it not important that this act of legislation should be completed and rounded by conferring the suffrage in the other States precisely as you have conferred it in the rebel States. I submit that to him as a question. You have conferred it in the rebel States.

Mr. JOHNSON. What has that to do with the other States?

Mr. SUMNER. You have conferred it by act of Congress in the rebel States. Will you have that great right of suffrage depend upon act of Congress in one half of the Union and not upon act of Congress in the other half. If you can do it in one half, can you not do it in the other half? I know the answer of my friend possibly, that in the rebel States the very fact of rebellion will give us a power which we have not in the other States; but then the bill under consideration is founded not simply upon the fact of rebellion, but upon the clause in the Constitution by which we are bound to guaranty a republican form of government throughout the whole country; also, upon the other clause by which slavery has been abolished throughout the whole country, and we are empowered by proper legislation to enforce it; also, that still other clause by which the rights of citizens are secured throughout the whole country, and we are empowered by proper legislation to enforce it. There you have the three sources of power equally applicable to all the States, rebel or disloyal. And now I submit that the doing it in the loyal States is only the just complement to your action in the rebel States.

How can you look the rebel States in the face when you have required colored suffrage of them and fail to require it in the other States? Be just; require it in the loyal States as you have now required it in the rebel States. There is an unanswerable argument, and I submit it on the question of order. If we are now privileged to consider only matters that are in aid of the original reconstruction measures, then I submit that this bill is in aid of those measures, for it is to give to them completeness and roundness. Unless you pass this bill your original measure is imperfect, ay, it is radically unjust. I know it is said you have one title to legislation over the rebel States which you have not over the loyal States, to-wit, that they have been in rebellion; but the great cardinal sources of power over the rebel States are identical with those over the loyal States. They are one and the same.

There is the clause in the Constitution directing you to guaranty a republican form of government. It is a clause which is like a sleeping giant in the Constitution, never until this recent war awakened, but now it comes forward with a giant's power. There is no clause in the Constitution like it. There is no clause which gives to Congress such supreme power over the States as that clause. Then, as I have already said, you have the two other clauses. Your power under the Constitution is complete. It is not less beneficent than complete.

However, I am not to be betrayed into the general constitutional argument. I am now simply on the question of order. I say that this bill is essential to perfect the original reconstruction measure. You ought not to go to your homes after having passed your reconstruction measure without this additional act by which that is finished. If any Senator has any reason to bring against this bill, if any one can suggest any doubt about its constitutionality, I really should like to hear the reason for the doubt, and I shall be ready to answer it. I challenge discussion of the bill. I challenge the expression of any reason against it, or of any doubt with regard to its constitutionality; and I appeal to Senators to look at this measure as a great measure of expediency as well as of justice. How are you going to settle this question in the loyal States? Here are Delaware, Maryland—my friend over the way will not be sensitive when I allude to his State—and Kentucky, in each of which this measure is the only salvation of Union citizens. Then there are other States like Pennsylvania, where this measure will give at once—I am speaking now on the question of expediency—twenty thousand votes to the Union cause. There is Indiana, too, where this bill will settle the suffrage question. I will say nothing about Iowa. There is Wisconsin.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They all vote there now.

Mr. SUMNER. Under the decision of the Supreme Court. Very well; so much the better then. There is Connecticut. Let us secure three thousand votes in Connecticut for the good cause. You can secure them by act of Congress. A little, short act of Congress can determine the political fortunes of Connecticut for an indefinite period by securing three thousand additional votes to the right side. There is New York, also, where the bill would have the same excellent, beneficent influence.

Who then can hesitate? Look at it in any light in which you please. Regard it as the completion of these reconstruction measures; regard it as a constitutional enactment; regard it as a measure of expediency in order to secure those results which we all desire at the approaching elections, and who can hesitate? You have had no bill before you for a long time the passage of which would be of more practical advantage than this. I hope there can be no question about proceeding with it, and that we may pass it before we separate to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to make a speech, but only to remind the Senate that the question now is one of order under the resolution that we have adopted. It is not a question as to the merit of this bill. I agree with my friend from Massachusetts that it has very great merit. It has supreme moral merit. I agree to every word of it. I am a little afraid, it is true, that there is a higher law that will bind us not to pass it for want of power.

Mr. SUMNER. Want of power! Will the Senator be good enough to state the reason?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, not on this point, because it is not relevant to this question of order.

Mr. SUMNER. But as long as the Senator is going into the question of the want of power I really wish he would deign to enlighten us upon that, for I have been reading newspapers, listening to arguments, conversing to the right and left, and I have never yet heard one argument against the power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will have to go without it so far as I am concerned, for I shall not make it.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I shall begin to think the Senator cannot make it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not a very dangerous state of things; but there are others who can. I merely wish to say that this is a question of order, not on the merit of this bill at all, and we have decided over and over again against pressing claims upon our consideration of the very highest merit that we would not break over this rule, and we are bound to adhere to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, whether the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to take up this bill for consideration is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Fowler, Harlan, Nye, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—19.

So the Senate decided the motion to be out of order.

BOUNTY BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill of the House (No. 127) in relation to additional bounty. What disposition will the Senate make of it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That must be laid on the table under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first reading of the bill—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that that bill be read a first time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must be laid on the table under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read, as I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to call for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to its being read. It is out of order to read it. It has been laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by common consent, and objection is made.

Mr. CAMERON. It is to extend the bounties to widows and orphans as I understand. I hope there will be no objection to reading the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can go to the desk and read it if he wants to do so.

MAURICE RICE EVANS.

Mr. CONKLING. Encouraged by the manifest disposition of the Senate to take up whatever is necessary and desirable, I have been requested to ask that a little joint resolution which lies on the table there about a midshipman be taken up, and I do not think there could be a more auspicious time than now. I therefore ask that it may be taken up. It is the joint resolution of which something was said yesterday, allowing a young man who is of proper age now to enter the Naval Academy, but who will forever be deprived of that opportunity before the next regular examination.

Mr. DRAKE. As the Senate seems to have adopted Heaven's first law, that of order, and as it has applied that law with exceeding rigor in a case where hundreds of the brave soldiers of Missouri were concerned to-day, I do not feel disposed to mar the order of this heavenly place by allowing other things to come in. I am afraid it would disturb too many of the saints in this Chamber. [Laughter.] Therefore I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator's statement is so brief that I am not satisfied whether he means to object or not. If he would extend his remarks a little, make them a little more full, I should be able to know whether he does object; but I am left in doubt whether he wishes to have this resolution taken up and put on its passage or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I would commend the gentleman very respectfully to the latest edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary for the meaning of the words. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is objected to, and of course you are under the rules. It can only be taken up by common consent.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to say in reply to my friend from New York who is pressing this bill, if I understood him it is a bill that certainly has merits, to secure a certain right to a young man. That is it, I believe.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend from New York has just voted against proceeding with a bill to confer rights upon a whole race, and yet he asks us to set aside a rule of order in order to proceed with a bill to confer a right upon one young man. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Of "the so-called white race." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish that the inconsistency of my friend from New York should be noted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour. ["No!" "No!"] There is nothing doing here, and we might as well take a recess. We have to wait the action of the House.

Several SENATORS. We shall have it in five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe that is debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it is debatable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have only to say to my excellent friend from Minnesota that we shall have a communication from the other House in the course of a few moments, either agreeing or disagreeing to our proposition for a committee of conference, and as soon as we learn that fact, the Senate will take such action as it thinks proper; but I think we had better be in a condition to receive the communication.

Mr. GRIMES. Cannot the committee act without the official notification being brought back here?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to be understood at the Secretary's table that we must have official notice of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was informed just now by a member of the House that they have insisted on their amendments and appointed their committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; then we shall have it in a moment. If it is already done, it will be announced here very soon.

Mr. RAMSEY. If that is the case I withdraw my motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. G. S. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have an order to print the bill, as it has gone to the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication received by him since March last:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
BOSTON, March 30, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith an attested copy of a resolve of the Legislature of the Commonwealth, ratifying the amendment proposed by Congress as a fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEX. H. BULLOCK.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The communication, with the accompanying paper, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

GRANTS TO SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be instructed to report a bill declaring forfeited to the United States all lands granted by Congress in the year 1856 to the States of the South to aid in the construction of railroads, which grants have now expired by limitation.

Mr. WOOD and Mr. CHANLER objected.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to suspend the rules; and I ask leave to make a statement in the way of explanation.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not object if we can have an opportunity to reply.

There was no objection.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to a single statement which I desire to make. In the year 1856, as is well known, grants of land to aid in the construction of various railroads in the South were made by Congress, amounting in all to about five million acres of land, much of it good land, as I learn from the records of the Land Office. Instead of building those roads the rebels engaged in war against the Government which granted the lands to them, and although the limitation of the grants have expired, yet these millions of acres are tied up in the hands of rebel corporations, so that the poor men, white and black, who desire homesteads upon them cannot resort to them.

Sir, I think we ought not to adjourn this session without removing that restriction, and opening up these lands to settlement and tillage under the act of June 21, 1866. I hope that the resolution will be adopted, and the committee allowed to consider the question at this session.

Mr. CHANLER. As a member of the Committee on the Southern Railroads, in the absence of the chairman I will state that we are prosecuting a thorough investigation of the relations which these roads hold toward the Government at this time. The condition of the stock and other property held by those roads is still being inquired into, and this, therefore, would be premature action on the part of the House. We ought to know first how the property of those southern roads now stands, who holds it, and what the other facts may be.

I think the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in supposing that the property of those roads is in the hands of enemies of the Government, or those who have been enemies of the Government. It is a very mixed question. The select committee have asked and obtained leave to travel and inquire into the conditions of those roads. While I would not ask to keep from the emigrant southern lands in favor of land corporations, I certainly think it due to the rights of vested property that this legislative body should wait until one of its own organized select committees, authorized to examine into this special subject, should report. While I do not oppose the final action of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, I do ask that we shall not act prematurely on this subject. The stockholders of these railroads are to be found North, South, East, and West.

Mr. JULIAN. I am not able of course to state what facts the gentleman has obtained through the medium of the committee of which he is a member. I know those lands are valuable, large in amount, and were granted to these States on conditions which were not complied with, because the men whose duty it was to comply with them, instead thereof, engaged in war against the Government; and I think we ought now to expose those lands to homestead entry and settlement in common with the other public lands of the South.

Sir, this resolution hinders no right action that the gentleman's committee may hereafter see fit to recommend. These lands ought to be available for present settlement, and if the committee should report the bill indicated and we should pass it, Congress could still make any disposition of these lands, or the renewal of those grants, that it might see fit to adopt. But I will modify the resolution so as to let the committee inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. CHANLER. This is a special question, and should be referred to the special committee on the subject. It is not a question of reconstruction; it is a question of vested rights in property.

Mr. JULIAN. I submit to the House whether this does not fairly pertain to the question of reconstruction and the pacification of the South and the country. The House must judge of this.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether there is any pretense that loyal men are interested as stockholders in any of those roads?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir; it is a fact before the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. In what case?

Mr. CHANLER. Roads in Tennessee and throughout the South. The question of loyalty lies at the bottom of the whole investigation by the committee, and I assure the gentlemen as far as the investigation has gone you are jeopardizing the rights of citizens who were loyal throughout the whole war by the proposed action.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I would like the gentleman to point out a road, and further to state whether there is any pretense of this sort as to any of the other States in rebellion.

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir; I understand so from the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Name the road.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not know; I only give the information as a fact before the committee. It would not be right to jeopardize the loyal stockholders of these roads. I do not profess to be acquainted with the names of the roads, but I assert the fact that if you assail the rights of these stockholders you assail the rights of citizens who were loyal to you through the whole war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to know whether the property is not confiscated by capture, under the laws of the United States.

Mr. CHANLER. That is a question for the Congress to decide. It is claimed by one side that it is so, and by the other it is denied. I understand there are certain rights which are exempt even under that stringent construction of the right of conquest. I understand from the Secretary of War, who was examined before the committee, that there is great leniency to be exercised in certain regards toward certain roads; that the rolling stock and all the force of those roads were used by the directors and corporators for the Government of the United States during the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Name any case of that sort.

Mr. CHANLER. I assert it as a fact. I do not know the names of the roads. I have not the report in my hands, but I assure you it is the fact. I am only protecting the rights of those in regard to whom I am charged by gentlemen on the other side as having no sympathy, the loyal men of the South.

Mr. JULIAN. The resolution offered relates to land grants in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, and Arkansas. I wish to know whether any of the roads to which the gentleman refers are located in those States.

Mr. CHANLER. I am under the impression that there are such roads in Alabama and Mississippi. I do not wish to have any political question involved; I only wish to state to the House, as a member of the select committee, that this is premature action, in my opinion. If the House will wait until the committee reports it will then have as much power to take this property as now, and will be doing just as much for the promotion of emigration in December next as it could do at this session.

Mr. JULIAN. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single remark? I think I can correct him and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] in one very material fact with reference to some of these southern roads. Some of them, running through Georgia and into Alabama, were originally constructed by northern capitalists, a very small portion of them being owned by southern men before the war. During the war the confederate government confiscated all the northern interests in those roads, but at the close of the war that confiscation ceased to be recognized at the South, and the vested rights of the northern capitalists in those roads were at once recognized, and they have been paying dividends to northern capitalists ever since.

Now, sir, I venture the assertion—and I know nothing of the investigation which has taken place before this special Committee on Southern Railroads—that there has not been a southern railroad constructed for the last twenty years, but either New York, Boston, or Philadelphia has furnished three fourths of the capital required for the purpose of construction. And if I am asked, as my colleague has been, to specify a case, I will name the Macon and Western railroad, which is owned principally at the North. The northern interests were confiscated since the close of the war; those northern interests have been recognized and transferred, the books are open in the Bank of the Republic, in the city of New York; the original stockholders have been transferring the stock and receiving dividends, and there is no question as to their rights.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a word of inquiry? Will he be kind enough to state from whom and from what quarters the recognition of which he speaks comes, and further, whether most of the rebel States have not contributed to a very large extent to the construction of those roads, and, also, whether in some instances they were not the exclusive owners thereof?

Mr. WOOD. If I understand the gentleman's question correctly, I will endeavor to reply to it. I suppose that the trustees of these roads recognized the northern stockholders, and that their names have been placed upon the books. I do not know that any State government in the South has taken any action on the question. I only state the fact, because a relative of my own is a very large stockholder. In reference to the general question, I can only say that about three fourths of the southern railroads, and three fourths of all the railroads in the United States, western as well as southern, have been constructed by northern capital. The object of this resolution is to confiscate northern capital, to apply a rule to northern capital because it is invested in the southern States which has not been applied to railroads in the West. The gentleman from Indiana knows very well that there is scarcely one western State that has kept its engagements with the Government, and where Congress has not granted an extension of time. Now, if in consequence of the war, in consequence of the deplorable condition of the southern States, the roads were not finished in time, if the roads could not be constructed so that these lands could be transferred to the companies, I hold that the Government should extend the same liberality to these roads that it has extended to others, especially as northern capital is invested in them.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I think it will be found that while the appropriate departments of the Government disclaim any authority to convey any title to real estate, it will be found that they have actually transferred to the State of Georgia a very large amount of mining stock claimed to have been identified by the original proprietors as belonging to them before the rebellion.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that the Congress of the United States cannot, by any retroactive action, disturb the interest of these men actually in possession of the land. The assumption is that the land never would have been transferred if the conditions prescribed by the law had not been fulfilled, and I hold that the third party now in occupation should not be sustained by any premature action of the House at this time.

Mr. JULIAN. Let me state to the gentleman from New York that no proposition is made here to confiscate the property of northern capitalists, because those northern capitalists, if the facts are as alleged, can unite with the loyal men of the South in asking for a renewal of those grants for sufficient reasons, and Congress could undoubtedly grant it, or allow new grants. As to the declaration of the gentleman that we have been in the habit of reviving and continuing these grants, it has only been done, as I understand, where a fair and honest effort has been made to do the work; but it was the intervention of the rebellion that stopped the work, and not the inability of the States to complete it. The rebels waged war against the nation, and hence the expiration of these grants by limitation.

Mr. WOOD. The northern capitalists are not to blame for that.

Mr. JULIAN. Neither should the landless millions of the South now be made to suffer by reason of it. What I ask is that the committee shall inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill declaring the forfeiture of the grant and leaving all the parties hereafter to make such showing as they can before the select Committee on Southern Railroads, or before the Committee on Public Lands. No rights can be concluded or compromised by the action I propose.

I now renew the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is this: that the Committee on Reconstruction was raised for a special purpose; that when we have disposed of the pending bill on that subject, the duties of that committee are exhausted; that they cannot be required to go into an investigation of land titles in the southern States; and that if the resolution is to be referred at all, it should be referred to some appropriate committee—not the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on these grounds: in the first place, the Committee on Reconstruction have not exhausted their powers or jurisdiction, as they have been charged with the consideration of a Senate amendment to a House bill, upon which they have not yet reported; and secondly, because the House has already referred to that committee a bill relative to the same subject as that embraced in this resolution; so that the committee have already jurisdiction of this subject without the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. WOOD. Two wrongs do not make a right.

The SPEAKER. The action of the House has already given jurisdiction to the committee.

On the motion of Mr. JULIAN to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the resolution, there were—ayes 72, noes 33.

Mr. BURR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 34, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Krontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Kerr, Marshall, Morgan, Munger, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Blaine, Brooks, Cake, Covode, Dawes, Dodge, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Harding, Hill, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ketchum, Lafin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrell, Morrissey, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomroy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Stewart, Taylor, Thomas, Burt Van Horn, and Van Wyck—33.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. JULIAN. I now ask unanimous consent to modify my resolution by striking out the words "States of the South" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas;" also by striking out "the Committee on Reconstruction" and inserting "the select Committee on Southern Railroads."

There being no objection, the resolution was modified accordingly.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference to the Committee on Reconstruction. When the resolution shall have been read I shall ask consent to make a brief explanation.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas by the several acts of Congress, called the reconstruction acts, the State government existing in Louisiana since the cessation of hostilities has been declared to be illegal and void, which declaration prevents said State or any official thereof from selling any State bond, obligation, or evidence of debt because of the doubt thrown on their validity; and whereas by the overflow of the Mississippi river, at times of high water, the most valuable and fertile lands, heretofore protected by levees, are washed and drowned and rendered wholly useless; and whereas it is necessary in the coming season of low water that the levees along the banks of the Mississippi river, and the bayous leading therefrom, should be strengthened, repaired, and enlarged, so as to prevent the recurrence of the overflow in the high water of the coming spring: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction, as one of the measures rendered necessary by the action of Congress on reconstruction, be directed to report forthwith a bill to the House which shall embody in substance the following provisions, namely:

First. That the commanding general of the fifth military district be hereby authorized to issue on the credit of the State of Louisiana coupon bonds, or registered bonds, to an amount not exceeding four million dollars payable twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of seven and three tenths per centum per annum, payable semi-annually; and that the bonds thereby authorized shall be of such denomination, not less than one hundred dollars each, as may be determined on by the commanding general. And the commanding general may cause such bonds to be disposed of at any time at the market value thereof, but at not less than seventy-five per centum of the par value for the lawful money of the United States.

Second. That the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be applied, under the direction of the State government authorized by said commanding general, to the repairs, enlargement, and construction of levees to protect the lands in said State from overflow, or for opening such bayous and outlets as may be necessary for the same purpose, and for no other purpose or use whatever; and the application or diversion of the proceeds of said bonds for the purpose and use contemplated by said act by any person whatever shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not exceeding the amount so diverted, and by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than five years, at the discretion of the circuit court of the United States, which shall have jurisdiction to try such offenses.

Third. For the payment of these bonds a perpetual lien shall be declared upon all the lands benefited or protected by such repairs, construction, and enlargement of such levee, or by the draining thereof by the opening of such bayous and outlets. And such lands shall be divided into three separate classes, according to the degree of benefit derived by them from such expenditure, and a proportionate tax shall be levied thereon sufficient to pay the semi-annual interest on said bonds, and to form a sinking fund adequate to pay the same at the end of said twenty years; and the several amounts payable to said sinking fund as they accrue shall be invested in United States registered securities only, which shall be sold and disposed of by the State authorities for the purpose only of paying said bonds; and when said sinking fund shall amount to enough to cancel said bonds and to pay the interest thereon, such taxation and levy shall cease.

Fourth. And as this act is for the benefit of the people of said State, and to relieve them from the disasters of flood and overflow, it shall be made a condition of the restoration of said State to its political rights in the Union, and of the acceptance of its frame of government by the Congress of the United States, that the constitution thereof as accepted by the people shall contain apt and competent provisions for the assumption of the obligation of said bonds by the State, and for the taxation and payment of the interest and principal thereof at the times and in the manner provided by said act, to which condition shall be embodied in the resolution or act of Congress accepting such constitution, and providing for the restoration of the State of Louisiana to her political rights and privileges as a State under the provisions of the several reconstruction acts and the acts supplemental thereto.

Fifth. The proceeds of said bonds shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Louisiana, and so much thereof as may not be expended held there under the direction of the commanding general for the purposes above specified until such State is restored to its political rights; and the work of construction, enlargement, and repairs of such levees shall be done and carried on under the direction of such commanding general until said State is so restored, in such manner and by such commissioners as he may deem expedient, and after such restoration, by a board of three commissioners, to be chosen by concurrent vote of both Houses of the Legislature of such State, which board shall be provided for in the constitution thereof.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were not suspended.

J. SCHIFFER AND COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. Schiffer & Co.; and the same were referred to the Committee of Claims.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported back the Senate amendment to House bill No. 123, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867," with the following amendments:

First amendment:

Strike out the first section, as follows:

That the true intent and meaning of the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed March 2, anno Domini 1867, was, is, and shall be construed to be that the military authority of the United States in said rebel States, as provided in said act, was and is paramount to any civil government existing therein, makes all such civil governments subordinate to such military authority, and prohibits them from interfering in any way with the exercise of such military authority, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That it is hereby declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act of the 2d day of March, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the act supplementary thereto, passed the 23d of March, 1867, that the governments then existing in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were illegal; and that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts, and to the authority of Congress.

Second amendment:

Amend the second section by striking out the words "subject to the approval of the General of the Armies of the United States" in the second, third, and fourth lines; and also the words "subject to the approval of the General aforesaid" in the thirteenth and fourteenth lines, and at the end of the section adding the following:

And to fill vacancies occasioned by death or resignation; and the district commander whenever he shall deem it necessary, shall have power to suspend, set aside, or affirm any act or proceeding of any State government, or any municipal or other division thereof, or any act or thing done under or by virtue of its authority.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commander of any district named in said acts shall have power, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said acts shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from or granted by or claimed under any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof, and upon such suspension or removal such commander shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment of some other person to perform the same, and to fill vacancies occasioned, &c.

Third amendment:

Amend the third section by adding the word "appointment" after the word "removal" in the third line; so it will read:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the General of the Army of the United States shall be invested with all the powers of suspension, removal, appointment, and detail granted in the preceding section to district commanders.

Fourth amendment:

Amend the fourth section by adding at the end thereof the following: "And it shall be the duty of such commander to remove from office, as aforesaid, all persons who are disloyal to the Government of the United States, or who use their official influence in any manner to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct the due and proper administration of this act and the acts to which it is supplementary;" so it will read:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers, and appointing others in their stead, are hereby confirmed: Provided, That any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army, and it shall be the duty of such commander, &c.

Fifth amendment:

Amend the fifth section by striking out from the word "before" in the seventh line to the word "act" in the tenth line, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof: "to admit to registration only such persons as they may deem entitled to be registered by the acts aforesaid;" and by striking out these words: "but in every case of refusal by the board to register an applicant, and in every case of striking his name from the list as hereinafter provided, the board shall make a note or memorandum, which shall be returned with the registration list to the commanding general of the district, setting forth the ground of such refusal, or such striking from the list: Provided, That no person shall be disqualified as member of any board of registration by reason of race or color;" so it will read And be it further enacted, That the boards of registration provided for in the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 23, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," passed March 23, 1867, shall have power, and it shall be their duty to admit to registration only such persons as they may deem entitled to be registered by the acts aforesaid, and the oath required by said act shall not be conclusive on such question, and no person shall be registered, unless such board shall decide that he is entitled thereto; and such board shall also have power to examine, under oath, (to be administered by any member of such board,) any one touching the qualification of any person claiming registration.

The sixth section of the Senate substitute was reported unamended, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary act is (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and whether he was holding such office at the time of the rebellion, or had held it before, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote; and the words "executive or judicial office in any State" in said oath mentioned shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of the general laws of a State.

Sixth amendment:

In line six of section seven strike out "twenty" and insert "fourteen;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the time for completing the original registration provided for in said act may, in the discretion of the commander of any district, be extended to the 1st day of October, 1867; and the boards of registration shall have power, and it shall be their duty, commencing fourteen days prior to any election under said act, and upon reasonable public notice of the time and place thereof, to revise, for a period of five days the registration lists, and upon being satisfied that any person not entitled thereto has been registered to strike the name of such person from the list, and such person shall not be allowed to vote. And such board shall also, during the same period, add to such registry the names of all persons who at that time possess the qualifications required by said act who have not been already registered; and no person shall, at any time, be entitled to be registered or to vote by reason of any executive pardon or amnesty for any act or thing which, without such pardon or amnesty, would disqualify him from registration or voting.

The eighth and ninth sections were reported unamended, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section four of said last named act shall be construed to authorize the commanding general named therein, whenever he shall deem it needful, to remove any member of a board of registration and to appoint another in his stead, and to fill any vacancy in such board.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of this act and of the acts to which this is supplementary shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out.

The next amendment of the committee was to add to the substitute of the Senate the following sections:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no civil court of the United States or of any State shall have jurisdiction of any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, against any such district commander, or any officer or person acting by his authority, for or on account of the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this act or the acts to which it is supplementary.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That no district commander shall be relieved from the command assigned to him under the aforesaid acts, unless the Senate shall have first advised and consented thereto, or unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered or dismissed from the Army, or in arrest for an offense punishable by dismissal from the Army, or disqualified by sickness for the performance of his duties.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall prevent or attempt to prevent or obstruct the execution of this act or either of the acts to which this act is supplementary, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That all members of said boards of registration, and all persons holding office in said military districts, under State or municipal authority, or by detail or appointment of the district commanders, shall be required to take and to subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for the officers of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no district commander or member of the board of registration, or the officers or appointees acting under them, shall pay any regard to the opinions or directions of the Attorney General or any other officer of the Government, unless so directed by Congress.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill for the purpose of allowing debate to go on.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to correct an omission by adding a proviso at the end of section twelve. I am informed that it was the intention of the committee to report it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will allow it to be offered.

The Clerk read the proviso, as follows:

Provided, This section shall not extend to or include any offense or offenses of which the military authorities may have or take jurisdiction under the provisions of this act or the acts to which it is supplementary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask if there is not an error in the last line of the sixth section. Instead of the words "of the general laws of a State," it should be "of any general law of a State."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Before the House can vote on these various amendments that motion will have to be withdrawn.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I know that; but I desire to allow several gentlemen to speak.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to this last section. I think the committee has inadvertently put language in that section which they did not intend. The section as it now stands provides that the boards of registration shall not give attention to any opinion of any officer of the Government. I think that it would be better to say that they shall not be bound by the opinion of any officer of the United States. They may ask the opinion of the general commanding, but they should not be bound by it. That they shall not regard the opinion of anybody, is not a good phrase. I will therefore move, at the proper time, to substitute the language of the section of the House bill. I understand that the chairman of the committee [Mr. STEVENS] has no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. That can be done when the amendments shall be reached after the motion to recommit shall be withdrawn if the House intends to act on the amendments separately.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I give notice of that amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL] in the fourteenth line of the sixth section, is to insert the word "any" before the word "general." I suggest to the gentleman that that may not accomplish what he desires. That last clause now is a mere reenactment of the opinion of the Attorney General, that the words "executive or judicial office in any State" shall be construed to include all civil officers created by law for the administration of the general laws of the State. I do not see that that yet gets rid of the difficulty that I apprehend exists. That difficulty is this: as the section now stands no one who holds an office created for the administration of municipal acts, such as for the incorporation of cities or towns, becomes amenable to its provisions. The consequence of that would be that the mayor of Mobile, in reference to whose action on one occasion the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] had some reason to complain, or Mayor Monroe, of New Orleans, who undertook to dispose of a convention because it did not answer his purpose, would be perfectly competent to be registered or to hold office. I think we ought to be more specific. I think we ought to include not only all civil officers created for the administration of any general law of a State, but to add to the section some such words as these, "or for the administration of justice or the keeping of the public peace." Then all mayors and all marshals of towns, and all persons whose duty it is to keep the public peace, and to act as magistrates in administering justice, will fall within the provisions of the law. It seems to me that they constitute a large class of persons upon whom devolve such responsibilities that they ought to be included.

I would therefore move, instead of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to add the words which I have suggested, "or for the administration of justice or the keeping of the public peace," so that any civil officer who is charged in any way with the administration of justice or with the keeping of the public peace shall be held to come within the description of "civil officer."

Mr. WOOD. I would ask whether the bill will not be acted on by sections, so that the gentleman can offer his amendment where it legitimately belongs?

The SPEAKER. The amendments proposed by the Committee on Reconstruction will be acted upon separately.

Mr. WOOD. Do I understand that this whole question is open to debate?

The SPEAKER. It is open to debate on the amendments.

Mr. WOOD. Then I desire to say one or two words. Although this bill is obnoxious to all the objections that applied to the bill as originally reported, inasmuch as it is in direct antagonism to the Constitution of the United States, is calculated to delay the matter of reconstruction, is all wrong, and can never be practically executed, yet in my judgment it is in detail somewhat of an improvement on the bill of the House.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the ambiguous phraseology of several sections of the bill now reported by the committee may be corrected, so that there can be no difficulty hereafter in knowing exactly the wishes of Congress in reference to reconstruction.

Now, sir, in the second section the committee propose to strike out lines three, four, and five, which give a discretionary power to the General of the Army of the United States; thus showing, permit me to say in passing, a very extraordinary distrust of General Grant. But the third section, in reference to the power of appointment, appears to me in conflict with the provisions of the second section. Again, by the sixth section all State officers are excluded from registry. Is this to be understood as applying to municipal officers? Are village officers excluded? Are county officers excluded?

Now, sir, in my judgment the committee should have so perfected the details of this bill as to render impossible a resort to the opinion of the Attorney General, so that Congress may not be again called together to remove any supposed obstruction in that direction. Although we on this side of the House cannot consent to the principles upon which this bill is founded, we are honestly desirous that the subject shall be disposed of; and for the purpose of disposing of it at once and forever, we desire a bill, plain, simple, and unequivocal in its provisions, so that there may be hereafter no difficulty on the part of the boards of registry in comprehending what classes of individuals they may enroll, and what classes are to be excluded; and that there may be a uniformity of action on the part of the commanding generals. The action of Congress at this time should be definite and unequivocal. Hence I think it is the duty of the Committee on Reconstruction, if the bill shall be recommitted, as I trust it will be, to examine again the phraseology of this proposed act, weighing well the differences between this bill and the bill of the Senate. The bill of the Senate seems to me decidedly preferable. It contains fewer sections, and its provisions are clothed in less ambiguous language. They are easy to be comprehended. There is no attempt in that bill, as we attempt here, to enfranchise all of one race and disfranchise all of another. There is no attempt in that bill to place the power of removal and appointment exclusively in the hands of the military. There is no attempt in that bill to override entirely the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. I only regret, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has not facilitated the disposition of this subject by reporting back to the House the bill as it came from the Senate. That bill, although as objectionable in its principles as the bill now reported, or the bill originally passed by the House, was one which there could be no difficulty in understanding on the part of the President of the United States, the Attorney General, or anybody else. Such a bill is what we want. We want this question disposed of now at once and forever. We want these States back again into the Union, even under the conditions which Congress is disposed to impose upon them. Let them know the worst, so that at no distant day we may have the southern States represented in the Congress of the United States.

Now, sir, I do not wish to examine the details of this bill reported by the committee; but I believe that it contains scarcely a section in reference to which honest men might not differ as to what was really designed to be accomplished. In one section it refers to municipal officers and in another to State officers. In one section it says that the commanding generals may do certain things, and in a subsequent section it provides, as I understand it, that only the General of the Army may do those things. There is confusion, there is uncertainty, there is doubt, which even a Philadelphia lawyer could not unravel, as to the design of the bill reported by the committee. Therefore I hope that whatever measure we may adopt shall be intelligible and plain, so that hereafter there can be no possible difficulty in understanding precisely what was the design of Congress in passing it. I now yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] I desire to say a single word. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] finds a great deal of difficulty in understanding this bill; and Congress itself has had some difficulty in understanding its action heretofore.

I will suggest to my friend from New York [Mr. Wood] that he should offer an amendment that will cover the whole case, I think, conclusively, and settle the whole matter beyond all cavil and doubt; and that is an amendment proposing to abolish the Constitution of the United States and all the laws of the United States, as well as all the constitutions of these ten States and the laws made under them, and under which these people have lived heretofore. It seems to me that will make the matter entirely clear and do away with all difficulty. The President will not be troubled with it any further. The Commander-in-Chief will not be troubled with it. You will then have no difficulty with the Constitution and laws of the United States. You will thus get rid of the whole question.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Wisconsin is an old fogey, for he ought to know that the Constitution of the United States has been obsolete for some time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want it declared to be obsolete, so that gentlemen hereafter shall not refer to it. I wish to relieve my friend from Ohio from all scruples on the subject, so that he may hereafter have no qualms of conscience when called upon to vote for propositions which shall come from the most radical gentlemen of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

CUSTOMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of March 6, 1867, a statement of the number of officers of customs removed and the names of the new appointees, increase of compensation allowed, &c., since March 3, 1866; and also a statement of the expenses of collecting the customs during the year 1865-66; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION ACT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the 5th instant, transmitting a report from the Adjutant General relative to the execution and administration of the reconstruction act; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON SPIRITS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of July 8, a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as to the amount of revenue received from the tax on distilled spirits; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of July 9, a report of the Paymaster General relative to the necessity of further legislation to facilitate the payment of additional bounty; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KITCHEN asked and obtained leave of absence after to-day.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the reconstruction bill.

Mr. LOGAN addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This debate has taken a range wholly unexpected. I supposed a few gentlemen would discuss the merits of the bill and that we would then take a vote. I do not feel at liberty to extend the time; therefore, if the House agree with me, I will withdraw the motion to recommit, and before I call the previous question ask any gentlemen if they have amendments to offer. If they have they may do so now and we will consider them as pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will offer the amendment which I indicated this morning, namely, to add to the end of section six these words: "or for the administration of justice or for keeping the public peace."

The SPEAKER. That is an amendment to the Senate amendment, and not to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. So I understand; I propose to amend the Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer a further amendment to section six, in line twelve, by striking out the word "construe" and inserting the words "so extended as," and I would like to assign my reasons.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment to the fourteenth section, which requires the board of registry not to regard the opinions of anybody, by substituting these words: "Said board of registry shall not be bound in their action by the opinion of any officer of the United States."

Mr. PILE. I move an amendment to the Senate amendment in section seven, line eight, by striking out "five" and inserting "ten," so that it will read "and upon reasonable public notice of the time and place thereof to revise for the period of ten days the registration list."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now call the previous question.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to move to amend section four by inserting in line four, after the word "confirm," the words "subject to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield for further amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I would move that five minutes debate be allowed for and against every amendment that may be offered or that is pending.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Then I move that the rules be suspended for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the yeas and nays on suspending the rules for the purpose of allowing us the poor privilege of five minutes debate on amendments, and I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and SCOTFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported forty in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 80, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baker, Barnes, Benton, Boyer, Bromwell, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Coburn, Cook, Culiom, Donnelly, Elia, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Haight, Holman, Hooper, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Neel, Pile, Poland, Randall, Raun, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarko, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Faine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Seofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Taylor, Twichell, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Benjamin, Blaine, Brooks, Calko, Dodge, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Humphrey, Laffin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrill, Morriss, Phelan, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, and Van Wyck—39.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] claim his right to close the debate?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not intend to make any remarks whatever. I wish to go on, and, if possible, to finish the bill. I waive my right to close the debate.

The Clerk then read the first amendment reported by the Committee on Reconstruction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that amendment divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The committee reported it as one amendment, to change the second section so as to read in the manner just reported by the Clerk.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will it be in order to think that the last part of that amendment is very good, while the first is all wrong? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and audible thinking is in the nature of debate.

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 66, noes 38.

The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments were severally read and agreed to.

The seventh amendment was read and agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes eighty-five, noes not counted.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth amendments were read and agreed to.

The eleventh amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, before this amendment of the committee is voted upon, the question will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to amend the amendment.

There was no objection.

The amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH was read, as follows:

Strike out in the eleventh amendment of the committee the words "pay any regard to the opinions or directions of the Attorney General or any other officer of the Government, unless so directed by Congress," and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall be bound in their action by any opinion of any officer of the United States;" so that the section proposed by the committee will read as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no district commander or member of the board of registration or any officers or appointees acting under them shall be bound in their action by any opinion of any officer of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I believe there is no objection to that amendment on the part of the committee.

Mr. NIBLACK. I suggest that instead of "any officer of the United States" it would be better to say "any civil officer of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted; there being on a division—ayes 62, noes 51.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the votes by which the several amendments of the committee had been adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the various amendments proposed by gentlemen on the floor, the first being that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to the sixth section.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That amendment was offered by me on behalf of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk did not so understand; but it will now be reported as one of the amendments of the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line fourteen of section six strike out "the" and insert "any," and strike out "laws" and insert "law;" so that the last clause of the section will read as follows:

And the words "executive or judicial office in any State" in said oath mentioned shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of any general law of a State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, as follows:

In the sixth section, line twelve, instead of "construed" insert "so extended as."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment:

At the end of section six add the following: Or for the administration of justice, or for the keeping of the public peace.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. PILE.

Mr. PILE. I withdraw my amendment, the House having changed the section.

The question next recurred on the following amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa:

At the end of section twelve insert: Provided, That this section shall not extend to or include any offense or offenses to which the military authorities may have or take jurisdiction under the provisions of this act or the acts to which this is supplementary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest that as section nine is a sort of codicil explaining the law, it should be at the end of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 32, not voting 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asabel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Elbridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, R. D. Hubbard, Kerr, Marshall, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Blaine, Brooks, Cate, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Finney, Garfield, Hubard, Humphrey, Ladin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrill, Morrissey, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Stewart, Van Wyck, and Windom—25.

So the Senate amendment, as amended, was passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House if any and what additional appropriation is required to carry out the provisions of the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States.

And then, on motion of Mr. PIKE, the House (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House at eight o'clock p. m. reassembled.

The SPEAKER stated the first thing in order to be the motion of Mr. HOLMAN to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following bill:

A bill in relation to additional bounty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the widow, minor children, or parents, in the order named, of any soldier who shall have died after being honorably discharged from the military service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the additional bounty to which such soldier would be entitled if living, under the provisions of the twelfth and thirteenth sections of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866, and the said provisions of said act shall be so construed: Provided, however, That such widow, minor children, or parents shall only be entitled to receive such additional bounty in case where such soldier, if living, would be entitled under the provisions of said act to receive the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

The rules were suspended; and the bill was received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the provisions and objects of the bill are well understood, and I therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire what is the object of the second section?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that is mere surplusage.

Mr. UPSON. I move then to strike out the second section.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the previous question on the passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. ELA. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution explanatory of the concluding proviso of section ten, chapter sixty-seven of the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, passed March 2, 1867.

The resolution was read. It declares that the provision was not intended to prevent the necessary printing heretofore done in connection with the issue, transfer, or assignment of Government bonds or notes or official envelopes or confidential circulars used in the Executive Departments by their own employes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does this come from any committee?

The SPEAKER. It does not. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire offer it for reference or action?

Mr. ELA. For action.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. ELA. I desire to make an explanation for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELA. As the law now stands the section of the law referred to provides that the printing of the Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office whenever practicable, and in all other cases that it shall be procured by the Clerk of the House. It will be manifest to every gentleman here that it would neither be proper nor safe, as regards the transfer and assignments which are printed upon the backs of the Government bonds and notes, for them to be carried to the general printing office. This resolution simply provides that in cases of that kind it was not the design of the act that it should be done elsewhere. It provides still further for the printing of confidential circulars by the different Executive Departments as they have been done heretofore; also that official envelopes may be printed in the same way, which is perhaps immaterial; but as I understand they are manufactured there and there is no expense attending it, it would be much more convenient and beneficial to keep the printing there.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not withdraw the objection.

Mr. ELA. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the resolution.

On suspending the rules there were—ayes 20, noes 46; no quorum voting.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move a call of the House. The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers on the motion to suspend the rules, and appointed Messrs. DRIGGS and WILSON of Iowa.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the House adjourn till to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion requires a suspension of the rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move then that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS. My object in pressing the motion was to compel the attendance of members who are now in the Senate Chamber, but who ought to be here. I again move a call of the House.

The question being put; there were—ayes 40, noes 31.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 59, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Driggs, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Getz, Gravelly, Haight, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Koontz, George V.

Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, McClurg, Niblack, Orth, Peters, Plants, Raam, Sawyer, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—39.

YAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Marvin, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Poland, Polsley, Price, Robertson, Scofield, Taber, Taffe, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Harding, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jenckes, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pile, Pomeroy, Prunty, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—72.

So the call of the House was refused.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BINGHAM stated that his colleague, Mr. EGLESTON, had been called home by illness in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will again take their places. The question is on suspending the rules to enable the House to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA.] upon which no quorum voted.

The tellers (Messrs. DRIGGS, and WILSON of Iowa) resumed their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 49.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. ELA. I now ask leave to introduce the joint resolution, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman that if there is a quorum of the Committee on Printing present he had probably better refer it to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that only one member of the Committee on Printing is in attendance on the session of the House at this time.

Objection was made to the introduction of the resolution.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill of the House to guaranty to the several States of the Union a republican form of government was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The motion was entered.

FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, requested to cause to be printed, for the use of the members of this House, ten thousand copies of the forms of proceeding in bankruptcy, as promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I will state, by the leave of the House, that the Senate have already ordered the printing of these forms.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is referred under the law to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House has nothing to do with the matter. It is of interest only to bankrupts and lawyers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the resolution has already been referred under the law to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought it was read only for information.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred.

Mr. MILLER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to move to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words "together with the book recently published by Mr. Clinton Rice upon the same subject."

The SPEAKER. A motion to lay the resolution upon the table is not debatable or amendable.

The question was taken on Mr. FARNSWORTH'S motion, and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for other purposes, with a view of having it referred to the appropriate committee when appointed.

Mr. WOOD. I object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. PAINE. I do not desire its consideration at this time. I only desire that it shall be referred to the proper committee when appointed, and that it shall be printed.

Mr. WOOD. I have no objection to that. No objection being made, the bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Militia when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. MORGAN. I hold in my hand and desire to present the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas in regard to levees on the Mississippi river.

The memorial was read.

Mr. SPALDING. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that. The Speaker was putting the question: on the motion to refer the petition, when

Mr. INGERSOLL said: Before this reference is made, I desire to inquire whether this paper purports to be from the Legislature of Arkansas as a legislative body?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I desire to object to its reception. I am not aware that there is any such body in existence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a petition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It purports to come from the Legislature of the State of Arkansas. I am not aware of the existence of any such body; and I object to the reception of the paper.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me any member has the right to refer any such paper under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The memorial could be presented under the rule by handing it to the Journal Clerk; but when any member desires to present such a paper in the House any gentleman can object. A number of years ago there prevailed in the House of Representatives a rule under which the presentation of petitions could be objected to in every case. But that rule has been abrogated; and the present rule allows any member to present any petition by handing it to the Journal Clerk. When, however, a member seeks to present a petition in open House objection may be made to its reception.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to the reception of this petition.

Mr. MORGAN. After the memorial has been received and referred to a committee is it not too late to object?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois made his objection before the question of reference had been decided. Objection being made to the reception of the memorial, the question is, Shall it be received?

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is an opportunity to get the petition to the appropriate committee without its reception by this House. I find here a divided duty. I am not prepared to concur in the reception by this House of a petition from a body which I know does not exist. Yet I believe there are few more important topics that can be brought to the consideration of any of the committees of this House than the question of the levees of the Mississippi—not only upon the banks of the rivers in Arkansas, but upon the upper tributaries of the Mississippi, where levees are required, and down to its mouth. I believe that there ought to be a national levee system—that the owners of the lands on the lower part of the river ought not to be compelled to depend upon the enforcement of an imperfect levee system above.

I hope that this subject will engage the attention of Congress at an early day after its re-assembling; and I hope that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] will avail himself of his privilege under the rule and have this petition referred to the appropriate committee. But I am opposed to receiving what purports to be a petition from a body which does not exist, and has not existed since 1861, the Legislature of Arkansas.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman says that this body does not exist. I desire to inquire of him whether he means that there is no such body in fact?

Mr. KELLEY. I mean, sir, that there is no Legislature of the State of Arkansas, because there is no State of Arkansas, and has been none since its government was overthrown by the violence of revolution.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] what is the meaning of the phrase in the law, for which he voted at the last session, "recognizing certain governments in Arkansas and other southern States as 'provisional governments'?"

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot be held personally accountable for the phraseology of all the laws for which I have voted any more than the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] can. So early as when Congress voted for the admission of the State of West Virginia I united with my venerable colleague from the Lancaster district [Mr. STEVENS] in asking that I might not be stultified by being supposed to have voted for the admission of West Virginia because the Legislature of Virginia had consented to the formation of that State. I agreed with my colleague that there was no State of Virginia, and that consequently there could be no Legislature of that State to give consent. I have never changed my opinion on the subject from that time to this.

Those State governments had been overthrown by the violence of revolution, and I borrow language from my venerable colleague [Mr. STEVENS] when I state that I voted for the bill containing that language because I was here upon this floor cooperating with men, and not with angels, and took the best thing I could get.

Mr. DAWES. My friend from Pennsylvania forgets one thing. He forgets that upon an amendment, unaccompanied by anything else, that in the struggle upon that amendment, whether or not that line should be inserted as a provisional government, my friend voted for it and I voted against it.

Mr. KELLEY. I apprehend the gentleman cannot show the provision in which I endeavored to convey the impression that I believed there was a government there.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman voted for the proposition simply alone and unconnected with anything else, that the de facto government should have the effect of a provisional government.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot recall an occasion such as the gentleman refers to. I voted for a bill in which that language was used for the purpose of limitation, and declaring that the governments previously referred to in the bill should be regarded as provisional only, subject to be suspended by the provisional authorities to whom the government of the people of these alleged States was about being confided. Here upon the floor of Congress and upon the platform when confronting my constituents I have uniformly and consistently held there was no government in those States, because there were no States, and have believed that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to govern those people as they would any other territory acquired or conquered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say what I wish to and then to surrender the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania a moment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield now. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of the debate taking so wide a range. It seems to me that this is a hair-splitting discussion on States in reference to the presentation of a petition. Here is a petition from gentlemen who style themselves the Legislature of Arkansas. I do not care what they style themselves; whoever presents a petition in respectful language on a legitimate subject is entitled to be heard. I do not believe its reception commits this House to anything. I do not believe that we commit ourselves to the government in Arkansas when we receive this petition and refer it. It has nothing to do with it. There is such a body, which has been recognized as provisional.

Mr. KELLEY. They cannot make a law which this Government cannot set aside.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is a body sitting there, a so-called Legislature. We may denominate it a so-called Legislature, or the petition of a so-called Legislature of Arkansas. It is a fact that no one can gainsay that there is a so-called government there, and that it has a Legislature which may pass laws which can be nullified and set aside by some higher authority. They present a petition and ask it to be referred to a committee of this House. It is a simple matter. I believe in the right of petition to Congress, and I hope this one will be received and properly referred.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania when did Arkansas cease to be a State?

Mr. KELLEY. When her Legislature elected under the Constitution of the United States refused to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and swore to support that of a belligerent confederacy, then Arkansas as a State in this Union ceased to exist.

Mr. MORGAN. In what year was that?

Mr. KELLEY. I believe in the year 1861.

Mr. MORGAN. In the year 1862 the Congress of the United States recognized Arkansas as a State and as entitled to her rightful number of Representatives in this Hall. After the act of secession had been passed the Congress of the United States, as it had the right to do, imposed upon Arkansas her share of the direct taxes, not as a Territory but as a State.

Mr. KELLEY. The Congress of the United States knew that the Army of the United States would conquer Arkansas, and presumed that there would be a new State created there before the decade expired, and it was its duty to declare how many members of Congress the State of Arkansas should have when thus reconstructed. Looking again to the certain conquest of the territory of Arkansas, and to the proper reconstruction of a State of Arkansas, Congress apportioned the taxes to the people of that then rebellious territory. And I cite the very argument of the gentleman against receiving this petition as an illustration of the folly of piling up these ridiculous precedents that, without due explanation, may be cited to show that the course of Congress has not been as straight as it might have been.

Mr. MORGAN. I would ask if the gentleman considers the act of Congress to amend the Constitution of the United States and presented to the Legislature of Arkansas for adoption no precedent or authority?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announcing that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Messrs. TRUMBULL, EDMUNDS, and HENDRICKS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the House insist, and that a committee of conference be appointed.

Mr. DAWES. Before the vote is taken consigning this bill to a committee of conference, I wish to congratulate my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] on the equanimity with which he has witnessed the rushing of this bill to-night into that hole from which he rescued it with so much zeal last night. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. If it had gone in last night it would have taken the gentleman from Massachusetts with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is in order I move as an amendment that the House recede.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken first on the motion to recede, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to insist and that a committee of conference be appointed, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed as conferees Messrs. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, BOUTWELL, and HOLMAN.

PETITION FROM ARKANSAS—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the petition from Arkansas in regard to levees on the Mississippi river.

Mr. KELLEY. The question propounded to me was whether I had voted for the amendment to the Constitution known as the fourteenth article, and for submitting it to the State of Arkansas for ratification.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Not whether the gentleman voted for it, but whether it was not presented to the Legislature of Arkansas.

Mr. KELLEY. I voted for that amendment, and it was passed, but it was never constitutionally or rightfully submitted to the Legislature of Arkansas. If the Secretary of State, or rather the gentleman occupying that position, Hon. William H. Seward, saw fit to submit that article, he may have done it for his personal gratification or in support of his peculiar views. But Congress never directed it to be submitted, nor did the Constitution or any law of the land require it; and whenever the question can be got before the Supreme Court of the United States, that court will, if it adheres to the principles which have controlled its decisions in the interim, decide that the submission of that article to the then twenty-six States adhering to the Union and supporting the Constitution is all that the Constitution requires; and that the submission of it to those bodies which assumed to legislate for the territory which is described by Andrew Johnson, the present political idol of the Democratic party, who is esteemed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] as the greatest President this country ever had except Washington, Jackson, and perhaps Jefferson, was unnecessary and nugatory. The language of that great idol of the Democracy, in his proclamation of May 29, 1865, in appointing a provisional governor for North Carolina, and which, as neither Mr. Seward nor he could improve it, was reiterated in all other like proclamations six times, was:

"Whereas the rebellion which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary progress deprived the people of the State of North Carolina [naming each of the other States in the subsequent proclamations] of all civil government."

I agree with Andrew Johnson that the violence of revolution had deprived the people of Arkansas of all civil government, which Congress alone could restore.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania mistaken when he says that a proclamation was issued as to Arkansas?

Mr. KELLEY. I may perhaps be.

Mr. NIBLACK. If I rightly understand the matter, that State was reorganized during the Administration of President Lincoln, and Governor Murphy was elected under Mr. Lincoln's proclamation by the State of Arkansas as reorganized by Mr. Lincoln's Administration. The propriety of that action I know entered into the canvass of 1864, but whether it was recognized or not, the government thus organized has been in existence ever since as the government of Arkansas. Whether it was regularly organized or not, the blame does not rest with the present Administration, but with its predecessor.

Mr. KELLEY. I accept the geographical correction of the gentleman from Indiana. It was only as to seven States, so called, that Mr. Johnson issued this proclamation.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would ask if the gentleman during the late Administration of Mr. Lincoln objected to the reorganization of Arkansas?

Mr. KELLEY. I will come to that point in a moment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will not yield, so that the committee of conference ordered by the House may be appointed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that committees of conference are never announced in the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to inquire if it has been appointed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will respond to that question, although it is not one that comes within parliamentary rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to know if it has been done, in order that a motion may be made to adjourn, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has gone to the Senate Chamber to ascertain if it is the intention of that body to sit to-night until the report of the committee of conference is acted on. If not the conference committee will include a member nowhere to-night, but who can act to-morrow.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the information I desired.

Mr. KELLEY. I will say in response to the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] that I did protest against that reorganization of the government of Arkansas as wholly unwarranted by the Constitution of the United States, that I argued the question with our late lamented President more than once, and in the presence of more than one person, and that I steadily and uniformly voted and worked upon this floor to prevent the admission to seats of the so-called Senators and so-called Representatives from the so-called State of Arkansas upon the ground that the same revolutionary violence that Mr. Johnson, before his abandonment of the professions on which he had been elected, recognized as having deprived the people of seven States of all civil government, had deprived the people of Arkansas of all civil government, and that the President had no power to reorganize or attempt to reorganize, except by the provision of Congress, governments upon all that territory; and, sir, this House is endeavoring and has been for the last week to learn something of the views of the Administration on the question at issue. My colleague from the Erie district on the 5th of this month introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State for information as to how many States had approved the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article. No answer has yet been received so far as the House has learned. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of you whether one has come into your hands?

The SPEAKER. In regard to what?

Mr. KELLEY. The call on the President was for information as to how many States had approved that constitutional amendment.

The SPEAKER. At this adjourned meeting there has been no answer. The Chair thinks there was a communication on the subject at the March session.

Mr. KELLEY. There has been no answer to the resolution offered by my colleague?

The SPEAKER. There has been none at this session.

Mr. KELLEY. Whenever that answer comes in, should he recognize these pretended States, it will be my pleasure, as it will be my duty to move, or to sustain the motion of somebody else, a resolution declaring the sense of this House that the constitutional amendment was improperly submitted to these pretended Legislatures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] that the Senate does not intend to sit to finish the reconstruction bill this evening. The Chair has appointed the conference committee on the part of the House; and whenever the gentleman from Ohio concludes his remarks or yields the floor, no further business in relation to reconstruction renders necessary a prolongation of this evening's session.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is neither my purpose nor my desire to make a speech. I do not rise with any such intention.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to yield for a motion to adjourn. This question will come up the first thing in the morning as unfinished business.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield for an adjournment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER. The petition of Charles F. Fletcher, praying that the right of citizenship may be given to the aborigines.

By Mr. MYERS. The petition of honorably discharged soldiers of Pennsylvania entitled to the additional bounty granted by act of Congress of July 28, 1866, asking congressional action to expedite the payment of said bounty.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 13, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITION.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of Nathaniel D. Carlile & Son, praying for the passage of a joint resolution by which certain wool imported by them and entered for duty on the 4th day of March last may be subject to payment of duty according to the laws in force prior to the passage of the act of last session increasing the duties on wool. This is a case where the petitioners allege that they paid the duty on this wool the day that the tariff bill became a law, the 4th day of March, and the increased duties were exacted; that the entry has not yet been liquidated at the custom-house; and they ask the passage of an act placing them on the same footing as they would have been if the goods had been entered on the previous day, as the vessel was in port on the previous day. If there was any business to be transacted at this session I should think this would be a proper case; but under the decision of the Senate, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table under the rule.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask leave to withdraw the papers in the case of Elias Beale. There was a favorable report, and all the relief he asked of Congress has been granted. My object in withdrawing the papers is to have them presented to the Commissioner of Pensions with his application for a pension.

Leave was granted.

RECESS.

Mr. TIPTON. I ask that the bill introduced by me yesterday may be taken up for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to refer a bill to the appropriate committee. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour. I understand the committee of conference will be ready to report at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose that motion takes precedence.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 12; and the Senate accordingly took a recess for half an hour.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The Senate reassembled at fifteen minutes to one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior.

The communication was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 13, 1867.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, calling for reports made to this Department by commissioners heretofore appointed, or by superintendents or agents of Indian tribes, together with any other authentic and reliable information in his possession, touching the origin and progress of existing Indian hostilities on the frontier, &c., I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 12th instant, with accompanying printed reports of Generals Buford and Sanborn, marked A and B, and copies of the reports, letters, and telegrams, numbered one to forty-five, inclusive, referred to in said report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

W. T. OTTO, Acting Secretary.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, President of the United States Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that there is a short report there from the Indian department, and as it is a matter of very great importance, and as the report of the committee of conference is not now before us, and I do not think there is anything else the Senate can engage in, I hope the Senate will hear it. It will not take more than fifteen minutes to read it.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will be read. We have been called on since I have been here this session two or three times for some plan to settle this Indian difficulty. I believe a plan is suggested in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS,
July 12, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by reference from your Department of Senate resolution of the 8th instant, calling upon the Secretary of the Interior to communicate to the Senate any reports made to his Department by commissioners heretofore appointed, or by superintendents or agents of Indian tribes, together with any other authentic and reliable information in his possession touching the origin and progress of the existing Indian hostilities on the frontier; also to communicate as far as he can the extent of the disaffection among the Indian tribes, whether they are warring war as tribes or as individuals, and if as individuals what disposition has been or is likely to be made of the friendly Indians formerly belonging to the hostile bands; and that he make such suggestions as in his judgment will lead to the most speedy termination of pending hostilities and prevent Indian wars in the future.

In compliance with your instructions to report all the facts in regard to these difficulties now in possession of this office, with such suggestions and views as I may deem necessary and proper in the premises, I would respectfully invite your attention to the inclosed printed copy of the reports of the Secretaries of War and Interior relative to the Fort Phil. Kearney massacre, which it is thought will show the cause of the commencement of the present hostilities, or at least of those at or near said fort where hostile demonstrations by any considerable force were first made by the Indians. The views in regard to the visit of the Indians who made these demonstrations, which resulted in the massacre of our troops, expressed by my predecessor in his report of the 4th of February last, are not correct, as will be seen from the report of General Buford, one of the commissioners appointed by the President to visit the Indian country, [see copy herewith marked A,] and from General Sanborn's report, also herewith B.

I also inclose copies of reports, letters, and telegrams received at this office since the reports of late Commissioner Bogy were made, as contained in said printed copy of reports. These papers, numbered from one to forty-five, inclusive, in the order of their dates, contain all the reliable information I have in regard to the matter since the 21st of February last.

A careful examination of these papers has led me to the following conclusions:

First. That the tribes and parts of tribes involved in the war are the following, namely: as tribes the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, numbering about one hundred and eighty lodges, say three hundred warriors; the Minneconjon band of the Teton Sioux nation, three hundred lodges, about five hundred warriors; those of the O'Gallala band of Sioux who would not consent to cede the right of way for the Montana road via Powder river and the right to plant military posts in their country, one hundred and thirty lodges, about two hundred and fifty warriors; those of the Brulé band of Sioux, who coincided with the O'Gallalas in opposing the cession of the road and post privileges, some one hundred and fifty lodges, about three hundred warriors; those of the Two Kettle band of Sioux entertaining the same views, about one hundred and fifty lodges and some three hundred warriors, making in all about sixteen hundred to eighteen hundred effective warriors.

These were the Indians who perpetrated the Phil. Kearney massacre, and who have been carrying on the war in the north.

On the Plains further south the only Indians known to be making hostile demonstrations are the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, numbering some two hundred lodges and about five hundred warriors, with possibly a few individuals from other tribes.

I am led to the conclusion—

Second. That the causes of the war are easily traced and readily understood when a few facts are known. These facts I proceed to cull from the official records.

In December, 1864, occurred the horrible Sand Creek massacre of friendly Cheyennes and Arapahoes in Colorado Territory. Exasperated and maddened by this cold-blooded butchery of their women and children, disarmed warriors, and old men, the remnant of these Indians sought the aid and protection of the Comanches and Kiowas, and obtained both. The combination which followed embraced all the tribes of the Plains from the Red river of the South to the Red river of the North, and resulted in the general Indian war of 1865, which cost our people many valuable lives and $40,000,000 in money. Peace was concluded with all the southern Indians in October, 1865. Peace was likewise made with the Missouri river Indians late in the same autumn, and the Indians engaged in the recent hostilities gave notice that they also were willing to bury the tomahawk.

Commissioners were accordingly appointed to treat with these Indians at Laramie, in June, 1866. Unfortunately a new complication arose. The commissioners insisted that the Indians grant the United States the right of establishing military posts at the base of the Big Horn mountain (now Fort Phil. Kearney) and on the headwaters of the Yellowstone river, (now Fort C. F. Smith,) the only remaining reliable hunting grounds of these Indians. The Indians occupying the country in the vicinity of the proposed military posts refused to grant the required rights. While this matter was still under consideration a military command arrived on its way to plant these forts, and the Indians, being informed that the posts were to be immediately established and garrisoned by these troops with or without their consent, at once withdrew from the council, refusing to accept presents, and very soon went to war upon all the troops who attempted to pass over this road. Such was the origin of the war on the Montana road.

In April of the current year the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes were peacefully occupying their village on the grounds assigned to them as hunting grounds by the treaty of October, 1865, when a military command under Major General Hancock, without any lawful provocation, burned down their homes of three hundred lodges (including perhaps one hundred lodges of friendly Sioux) and all their provisions, clothing, utensils, and property of every description. In view of these facts it is scarcely deemed necessary to seek further for reasons for the hostility of the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes.

While searching for the origin of our existing Indian war, I beg leave to insert here the following extract from a letter of Lieutenant General Sherman, dated Fort Lyon, Colorado, September 30, 1866, forwarded to the Secretary of War by General Grant, and referred to this office:

"Craig (formerly a colonel or captain in the Army, and owner of a large rancho on the Huaciano) may be taken as the best sample of the class of men who are settling along the east base of the mountains. He has the thoroughly proven ability to produce, but then comes the more difficult problem of consumption, who is to buy his corn? The miners of Colorado in the mountains two hundred miles distant will take some, but the cost of hauling is enormous. The few travelers and stage companies will buy a little, but he and all situated like him look to our military for a market, and that is the real pressure for garrisons and an Indian war. The Utes are harmless and peaceable, and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes are off after the buffalo, God only knows where, and I do not see how we can make a decent excuse for an Indian war.

"I have traveled all the way from Laramie without a single soldier or escort. I met single men unarmed traveling along the road, as in Missouri. Cattle and horses graze loose far from their owners, most tempting to a starving Indian, and though the Indians might easily make a descent on these scattered ranches, yet they have not done so, and I see no external signs of a fear of such an event, though all the people are clamorous for military protection. I received at Pueblo a petition to that effect, signed by so many names that I could not help answering that the names to the petition exceeded in number the strength of any of our small garrisons. Still I do think that the efforts of these people to transform the desert into productive farms is worthy of encouragement of the General Government, and I will treat of the subject again at length. After spending part of a day and the night at Craig's I resumed the journey down the Huertano twenty miles to its mouth, thereforde the Arkansas, and turned up five miles to the house of Colonel Boone, a man of note in this quarter. He also has a good two-story frame house, with his family, embracing the wife of Colonel Elmer Otis, but she happened to be away on a visit to some neighbor and I did not see her. Colonel Boone was at home, and I talked with him freely on the above and all other points of interest. He is an old Indian man, was on the Plains with General Ashley as early as 1824, and has been more or less connected with the Indians ever since. He also made the treaty with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes in 1860. He cultivates a farm and lives seemingly as little apprehensive of danger from Indians as the rest of the people. After camping a night near his house, we turned down the Arkansas, and traveled, in three days, one hundred miles to this post, Fort Lyon. I did not see or hear of an Indian the whole distance, though we passed through the whole length of the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation."

The above letter is dated September 30, 1866. I learn from the papers herewith, particularly from General Sanborn's report of the 8th instant:

Third. That a portion of our commission met representatives of all or nearly all the hostile bands of the north at Fort Laramie as late as the 12th of June last, and went into council with them; that they professed a willingness to make peace, agreed to cease offensive war until autumn, with a view of making a satisfactory treaty in the interim, and I am informed by one of the commission now in Washington, namely, General Sanborn, that they are willing to stipulate that the Montana road, with necessary military posts to protect it, may go through their country west of the Big Horn mountain, which would avoid their choice hunting grounds. He is satisfied also that they will, for a reasonable compensation, agree by treaty to the present location of the road and the posts. I conclude—

Fourth. That while the hostile bands are willing to make a lasting peace upon anything like equitable terms, and while the friendly Indians are exceedingly reluctant to go into war with the United States, yet a further and persistent disregard and violation of the natural rights of the Indians and of the treaty obligations of the Government toward them, such as have characterized our military operations among them for the past twelve months, will soon result in an Indian war of gigantic proportions, and of prolonged and indefinite duration, at an appalling expense of life and at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. If we desire this result, if we want the war we have provoked enlarged and intensified till our whole frontier is in a blaze, till our infant Territories are isolated and besieged and Pacific overland communication cut off, we have only to press a little further the policy we are now pursuing and we will get all we desire.

From the facts before me I conclude—

Fifth. That we can have all we want from the Indians, and peace without war, if we so will, with entire security on all our frontiers and in all our territorial domain, at a cost of less than two days' expenses of the existing war, (to wit, $250,000,) and in less than one hundred days. But how shall peace be so easily and so soon made? Simply by retracing our wrong steps and by doing right. Pay the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes and the hostile Sioux for the trespass we have committed upon their recognized rights, and negotiate with them by fair treaty for the privileges of way and of military posts on their lands so far as we may need them. This is only doing them justice, as our established policy requires, and this makes them our friends at once, renders travel and transportation safe and garrisons almost useless. Restore to the southern Cheyennes their village and their property we so wantonly and foolishly burned and destroyed, or pay them a fair price for them, and they will come back from the war path and resume the avocations of peace.

It is believed that the destruction by our forces of the Cheyenne village and property (valued at $100,000) in April last has already cost the Government more than five million dollars in money, one hundred lives of citizens and soldiers, and jeopardized all our material interests on the Plains and along hundreds of miles of our frontier.

It will be seen among the papers herewith that Lieutenant General Sherman, in a dispatch to the Secretary of War, dated Fort McPherson, Nebraska, June 17, 1867, among other things, says: "My opinion is if fifty Indians are allowed to remain between the Arkansas and Platte, we will have to guard every stage station, every train, and all railroad working parties. In other words, fifty hostile Indians will checkmate three thousand soldiers." Now, if this be true between the Arkansas and the Platte, of which region he is speaking, what a tremendous army will be required in the field if we conclude to precipitate a general Indian war and to prosecute it to a successful result.

In my judgment we have war general, prolonged, bloody, and ruinous, with all its accompanying barbarities and atrocities, and peace speedy and durable, with all its concomitant and consequent blessings, in our own hands and at our own option.

To make peace it is, in my opinion, necessary, first, that that part of an act approved March 29, 1867, repealing "all laws allowing the President, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into treaties with any Indian tribe" shall be repealed; otherwise there can be no binding agreement for peace made with the hostile Indians, second, that an appropriation should be made to defray all the necessary expenses to be incurred in making the desired treaties: third, that all military operations within the Indian country shall be subject to the direction and control of the Indian department. Supply these essential prerequisites, and I am firmly of the opinion that peace can be restored in a very short time.

In regard to the best means to secure and perpetuate peace between the Indians and our people, I beg leave to suggest that it is essential to the perpetuation of peace with the Indians, first, that the Government respect religiously and protect by all means their natural rights, as ascertained by our own highest judicial tribunal; and second, that it observe strictly and carry out faithfully all its treaty obligations to them.

We have reached a point in our national history when, it seems to me, there are but two alternatives left us as to what shall be the future of the Indian, namely, swift extermination by the sword and famine, or preservation by gradual concentration on territorial reserves and civilization. Our present policy or rather want of a policy in this regard is working out, and must result, if persisted in, in extermination. As now situated the Indian tribes are in the way of our toiling and enterprising population, and unprotected they will soon be inevitably submerged and buried beneath its confluent surges. Possessing originally the continent, they roamed at will among its mountains, valleys, and broad plains free and untrammelled, the proprietors and lords of them all. But rapidly our race has relieved them of their vast domain, and the remnants of the ancient red nations encircled by the pressing millions of our people maintain a precarious foothold on their last hunting grounds. These millions will soon crush them out from the face of the earth unless the humanity and Christian philanthropy of our enlightened statesmen shall interfere and rescue them. The sentiment of our people will not for a moment tolerate the idea of extermination.

In my judgment, the Indians can only be saved from extinction by consolidating them as rapidly as it can be peacefully done on larger reservations, from which all whites, except Government employes, shall be excluded, and educating them intellectually and morally, and training them in the arts of civilization, so as to render them at the earliest practicable moment self-supporting, and at the proper time to clothe them with the rights and immunities of citizenship.

The path by which humanity has emerged from a condition of savage barbarity to its largest development has been through pastoral pursuits into agriculture and the arts up to the highest sphere of mental refinement in the learned professions.

Entertaining these ideas I beg leave to recommend that the Government take such steps as may be deemed proper to set apart a territory somewhere north of the northern line of Nebraska and west of the Missouri river of liberal dimensions for the exclusive occupation and ultimate home of all the Indians north of the Platte and of Iowa, and east of the summit of the Rocky mountains, and make appropriations at once to enable this department to make suitable preparations for such Indians as are now ready to enter upon pastoral and agricultural pursuits in said territory. To initiate this policy, if adopted, I ask an appropriation of $100,000.

That the policy indicated may be of universal application, I would respectfully recommend that a large territory be set apart south of the southern line of Kansas and west of Arkansas, including the present Indian Territory and the country known as the staked plains of Texas, and so much of New Mexico as may be necessary, for the exclusive occupation and ultimate home of all the Indians south of the Platte and east of Arizona, and for the inauguration of this plan in reference to said territory and said Indians I respectfully ask that an appropriation be made of $100,000.

I recommend that all necessary provisions be made by Congress to procure at once that portion of Texas, or so much thereof as may be necessary, lying between the western boundary of the Indian Territory and the eastern boundary of New Mexico.

I would recommend that a commission be appointed, to proceed to the Pacific coast and Arizona, to select one or more reservations of ample size upon which to concentrate all the Indians west of the Rocky mountains. And for this object I ask an appropriation of $20,000.

There are now concentrated on the Niobrara river near the Platte river, under the chiefs Spotted Tail, Swift Bear, Two Strike, Big Mouth, and others, about fifteen hundred friendly Sioux who have separated from the hostile bands. To this number will soon be added some twenty to twenty-five hundred friendly Indians now on their way from the hostile country. Pending hostilities, or until placed on reservations, and until they shall have raised a crop or two, these Indians will have to be subsisted by the Government, or permitted to join their hostile kindred. To give them three-quarter rations will cost $300,000 per annum, and I recommend that this sum be appropriated by Congress at its present session for their subsistence for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

The friendly Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Apaches of the south, forced by General Hancock's command to abandon their hunting grounds set apart to them by the treaty of October, 1865, are now at or near Fort Cobb, in the Indian country, in a destitute condition, and numbering (with the Kiowas and Comanches) from five to seven thousand souls. These Indians, if not permitted to return to their own hunting grounds, must either be fed by the Government or be driven to plundering the border inhabitants and war. I therefore ask an appropriation of $500,000, for the purpose of supplying these Indians, if found to be necessary.

I ask also an appropriation of $100,000 to enable the Department, if found expedient, to reimburse the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes and friendly Sioux for their village and property destroyed by our troops in April last, with a view to restoring peaceful relations to them and safety and security to life and property on the Plains.

In conclusion, I take the liberty of stating to the honorable Secretary, for the information of the country, that the total cost of the Indian Bureau in its extended field of operations, including all its expenditures, does not exceed $3,000,000 per annum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. W. T. OTTO,
Acting Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the report lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, submitting an estimate of an appropriation required to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief of the Navajo Indians now at or near Fort Sumner, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867. The amount is $304,320.

Mr. POMEROY. Do I understand that is an estimate for an appropriation sent to us by the head of a Department?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. POMEROY. Such communications should be sent to us through the President. It is against our rules to receive communications making estimates for appropriations, excepting through the President of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. The Secretaries send estimates.

Mr. POMEROY. I remember once the Senate passed a resolution returning such a communication because it did not come through the President.

Mr. WILSON. This is from the Secretary of the Interior, the head of a Department.

Mr. POMEROY. I know it is from the Secretary of the Interior. It has been done in a few instances; but the Senate, in more than one instance, has sent it back to the head of a Department because it did not come to us through the President. I do not know that I shall make a motion now; I only call attention to the fact that such communications making estimates for appropriations should be sent to us from the Departments through the President.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is clearly mistaken. Each Secretary makes his own estimates. They are sent here certainly sometimes by the Secretary of the Treasury without coming through the President at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By law the Secretary of the Treasury communicates directly with Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. The instances alluded to by the Senator from Kansas are certainly instances of this character, where heads of bureaus and not the heads of Departments have made estimates. He is certainly mistaken. I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened at half past one o'clock, when the Senate took a recess for three quarters of an hour.

The Senate was again called to order at a quarter past two o'clock.

RECONSTRUCTION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first amendment of the House with the following amendments: in line ten strike out the word "illegal" and in lieu thereof insert "not legal State governments;" in line thirteen, before the word "authority," insert the word "paramount;" and that the House agree to the same as amended.

That the House recede from its second amendment to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the second section of the Senate amendment amended as follows: In line three strike out the word "approval" and insert "disapproval;" in line four, after the word "States," insert and to have effect till disapproved;" in line seventeen strike out the word "approved" and insert "disapproved;" in line seventeen after the word "general" insert the word "as;" and add at the end of the section, "and to fill vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the third section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the fourth section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendments to the fifth section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendments to the sixth section of the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments: strike out the word "time" in the ninth line and in lieu thereof insert "commencement;" in line seventeen strike out the words "the general laws" and in lieu thereof insert "any general law;" and at the end of line seventeen add "or for the administration of justice;" and that the Senate agree to the same as amended.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the seventh section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendments adding sections nine, ten, and eleven, being House amendments eight, nine, and ten.

That the Senate agree to the House amendment eleven, numbered section twelve, with the following amendments: strike out the word "holding" after the word "persons" in line two and in lieu thereof insert the words "hereafter elected or appointed to;" insert the words "any so-called" before the word "State" in line three; and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the twelfth amendment of the House, numbered section thirteen, with the following amendment: insert the word "civil" before the word "officer" in the fifth line, and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the thirteenth amendment of the House, amended as follows: in line one strike out "fourteen" and insert "eleven."

L. TRUMBULL,
G. F. EDMUNDS,
T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

T. STEVENS,
G. S. BOUTWELL,
W. S. HOLTMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have some explanation of this report, for following it as closely as I was able to I am still left in some doubt as to the extent of the change which has been made. I should like to ask my friend in what condition section twelve of the House amendments is left.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate agrees to section twelve of the House amendment with amendments. If the Senator has it before him he will see that the amendment is by striking out the word "holding" in the second line and inserting in lieu thereof "hereafter elected or appointed to;" and then in the next line by inserting the words "any so-called;" so that the section as reported by the committee on conference will read:

That all members of said boards of registration, and all persons hereafter elected or appointed to any office in said military districts under any so-called State or municipal authority, or by detail or appointment of the district commanders, shall be required to take and to subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States.

I shall be very happy to answer any question, or to make any explanation in my power, to enable any member of the Senate to understand exactly the condition of the bill as reported by the committee of conference. I would go on and make a statement as to all the amendments; but I apprehend it would be very difficult to make it so clearly as to have it understood without attention being called to the particular amendments. If there is any particular amendment that the Senate does not understand, or any Senator, I shall be very happy to afford any information. I believe I have answered the question of the Senator from Massachusetts so that he will understand exactly what the change is.

Mr. SUMNER. I do now. The change, as I understand it, is to make this clause prospective instead of being at once prospective and retroactive. As it came from the House it practically vacated all existing offices. In that respect, I must say in all frankness, I prefer the proposition as it came originally from the House of Representatives. I regret that our committee felt obliged to require any such change. And now, as we are about to dismiss this subject for the present session, I cannot forbear again expressing my regret that the measure has not been made more complete, in one word, more radical. This is the third bill of reconstruction on which we have been called to act. We ought never to have acted on more than one; and had the Senate been sufficiently radical, had it founded its bill on clear, definite principle, there would have been no occasion for more than one. Just to the extent to which we have failed to found ourselves on clear, definite principle our bills have failed; and should there be a failure hereafter under the present bill it will be precisely on that account. I shall never cease to lament that Congress did not at once assume jurisdiction of this whole region, and establish civil governments in the exercise of its plenary authority under the Constitution of the United States, giving to those governments ample military support. Such a measure of reconstruction would have been founded on principles which would defy the criticism of history. I hope that what we have done will hereafter be judged leniently. I know, however, that it is not above criticism. Of course such a measure would have removed out of sight all the existing State governments and municipal governments which have been set up there by rebel authority or by the President in the exercise of a usurped authority. And now I think it is not too late to do this last work; even if you decline to establish civil governments, I think that under your military bill you should go forward and brush away all the existing governments there. From the information that comes to me privately and publicly out of every one of the rebel States I am led to this conclusion. Those governments, whether State or municipal, are just so many centers of rebel influence. They stand in the way of reconstruction. They prevent the beneficent operation of your legislation. However, the Senate has declined to enter upon that path. I regret it, and I now at this last moment record my regret.

Again, the Senate has declined to require of these people certain conditions which I think essential to a system of republican government. One of these is a system of public education. I shall never cease to lament that there has been a failure in that regard. I have now in my hands a paper from New Orleans, which has come to me since I have been at my desk to-day, of July 9, 1867—it is a paper I believe edited by colored persons, and an excellent paper it is, The New Orleans Tribune—which contains an article entitled "Public Schools," from which I will read a brief sentence:

"Who will open the public schools to all children? We are of opinion that it will only be done by a colored mayor with colored members of the city council. This opinion is justified by facts."

The article then goes on to set forth the impediments which they have found in the way of public schools. And yet in the face of such intelligence from the rebel States, we have declined to require a system of public education as an essential element in these new governments. I regret it; and I desire again to record my regret.

I fear, also, Mr. President, that in the operation of this bill you will find that we have not been sufficiently explicit in the exclusion of rebel influence. I have made my best effort to remove doubts on the existing bill and to add to the exclusion. In saying that, I desire, however, to remark that I regard all exclusions as belonging to what I call the transition period. When reconstruction is accomplished then the time will come for us to open the gates, but not till then.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am a little surprised at the course of my friend from Massachusetts. The committee of conference was charged with a certain duty as I supposed, which was to meet with the conferees of the House and endeavor to agree with those conferees in carrying a bill, in regard to the details of which the two Houses had disagreed, in such a way on our part as to carry out the views of the Senate. Now the Senator from Massachusetts must know that we had no jurisdiction over this question of schools. There was no such provision in the bill. So far from it, the Senate had voted down his educational proposition refused to entertain it. Then what could the committee do? He certainly could not expect the committee of conference, against the vote of the Senate, to put such a clause in this report.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will understand me as not making any criticism on the committee. I was simply speaking of the bill in this final form.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference. The conferees of the Senate endeavored to carry out the views of the Senate, and we think we have substantially done so. We have preserved in the bill which is reported all the features which were in the bill passed by the Senate. I think there is no change that materially affects the bill as we passed it.

We have also been compelled to accept some amendments made by the House. I think the amendments that we have agreed to accept in order to produce harmony between the two Houses are of a character that do not materially affect the bill as it was passed by the Senate; and I believe the bill now as it comes back from the committee of conference is substantially the bill as the Senate matured it and sent it to the other House. This is all we could do as a committee of conference. Certainly the Senator's remarks now upon this question of agreeing to the report of the committee, going to show that the original bill was not right, are entirely out of place, it seems to me, because we are by no means responsible for not having such a bill as the Senator wanted. We should be responsible to the Senate if we had reported a bill from this committee substantially different from the views of the Senate as expressed in the passage of its bill. That I think we have not done.

Now, sir, I have not gone into an explanation of these various amendments. I state, however, to the Senate that the bill as reported by the committee of conference embraces, as I think, substantially the bill as it passed the Senate, and that it has no new features incorporated into it materially affecting the bill as we passed it. If any Senator desires information as to any particular section I shall be most happy to give it.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee of conference if section nine of the House amendments is retained or stricken out?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Section nine of the House amendments was disagreed to by the committee of conference, and is stricken out.

Mr. THAYER. That is the section prohibiting civil courts from certain interference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; that is left out.

Mr. THAYER. And also sections ten, eleven, and twelve?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; section twelve is retained with a slight amendment; sections ten and eleven are stricken out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I may be excused perhaps for imitating the example of the Senator from Massachusetts and making an explanation, though I have no solemn protests to record or regrets to express about this business. I was on the committee of conference—not representing myself on that committee as I understood, but representing the Senate, and felt it to be my duty to secure, as far as my influence would go, the will of the Senate as it had been expressed on questions of disagreement between the two Houses. I think the result of the conference has been to secure substantially the pleasure of the Senate as it had been expressed in the votes during the last few days. But perhaps it is due to myself to say that in signing the report I did not give my personal approval to the result of this legislation, nor to all the matters that find their way into this report; but as a representative of the Senate I thought it my right and my duty to sign the report, inasmuch as it substantially secured the will of the Senate, that is of the majority of this body.

In one or two particulars I do not like this bill as well as I did the Senate bill. The first section of the Senate bill was a franker statement and a more logical statement of this legislation than this first section, as it now stands upon the report of the committee. Indeed, much of this section, as it comes from the House of Representatives, has not very much force or intelligence in it. It declares in the first part just what was declared in the legislation of last March: that the southern State governments are not legal; and then it is stated that said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the paramount authority of Congress. That is substantially declared in the first section of the Senate bill.

I could not, if voting on my own account, at all have supported the twelfth section; but the modification which the committee secured made it less offensive to me than it was as it came from the House. The oath which is to be required of southern office-holders hereafter, as the House framed the bill, was required of all now in office. The effect would have been to drive every man in the southern States holding office under the State governments from office if he could not take this oath. As the section now stands it requires the oath only of those who may be hereafter elected or appointed; so that it stands now less objectionable, in my judgment, than the section as it came from the House, and never as I thought to the wish of the Senate.

The thirteenth section I thought ought never to find its way into any act of Congress:

No district commander or member of the board of registration, or any of the officers or appointees acting under them, shall be bound in his action by any opinion of any civil officer of the United States.

I suppose the purpose of that is to declare that in the administration of this law and the laws to which it is amendatory the officers shall not be bound by the opinion of the Attorney General. I do not think Congress ought to make a declaration of that sort in any law. It has been the policy of the Government from the first to provide to the Cabinet and the President an adviser upon law questions. It has been found a wise policy; the Attorney General has been found a useful public officer; and to say that a subordinate officer, who may have no knowledge whatever of law, shall be authorized to disregard the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States upon the construction of the law which that officer is to execute is to assert a higher intelligence and higher integrity in that subordinate officer than is presumed to be found in the Attorney General—a contradiction to the policy of the Government from almost, if not altogether from, its foundation. A registrar of votes is authorized by this bill to say that the opinion of the Attorney General, if it shall be given in regard to this law, is not the correct construction of the law. I suppose that the opinion of the Attorney General is not binding on any officer of the Government in one sense. It is not binding in the sense that a superior officer may issue an order to an inferior officer which that inferior ought to and must obey; but the opinion of the Attorney General is addressed to the judgment, and ought certainly to receive the respectful consideration, of any officer who is called upon to execute any law upon which that opinion may be expressed; and is there such a crisis in our affairs that we are authorized to reverse a policy which has been found so useful and so wise?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that section relate to the President?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The section relates to any officer who gives an opinion; but it would not relate to the President if the President issued an order. Practically, this section is not hurtful. The President will yet take the advice of the Attorney General, I presume; and if he believes that advice to be sound, upon it he will issue the proper orders as the superior in command of the Army, as at the head of the administration of the laws; and that order must be obeyed by all inferior officers. While the inferior may not regard, in his judgment, the opinion of the Attorney General, he must obey the order that comes from his superior; so that the section itself, practically, is not hurtful perhaps; but in my judgment it is a blot upon the legislation of the country and not creditable to the intelligence of Congress.

I regret very much that the officers of the State governments are required to take what is called the iron-clad oath. I think it is inconsistent with what Congress proposes to do. Does Congress undertake to regulate these State governments which in its very law it declares to have no legal foundation? It is competent for Congress to require of officers who may be appointed under this law and under the laws to which this is an amendment to take any oath that may be prescribed; but for Congress to go beyond that and prescribe the oath which shall be taken by an officer in a government which Congress declares not to be legal is in my judgment simply an absurdity. But I hope it will not be hurtful. The opinion has been expressed to me by a very well-informed gentleman that it will be difficult to find in very many localities persons to fill the local and, in many instances, important offices under the State governments if this becomes a law. If a practical inconvenience be found I will trust to the fairness of Congress to remove the trouble. I believe one of the commanding generals in a letter recently written has expressed the opinion that if all the class of men who would fall within the provisions of this section be excluded from public office, government must suffer for the want of intelligence and integrity in the service; and with that information from one general, who I believe commands in a very high degree the confidence of the majority in Congress, we enact this section. It did not command the approval of my judgment; but I was not advised that it was offensive to the majority of the Senate, and therefore I felt authorized as representing the Senate to sign the report of the conference committee which contained that section.

I was very much gratified that we were able to reject the ninth section altogether as it came from the House, which provided that no man should be heard in court for any wrong done to him by any officer under the pretense of the authority of this legislation. It could not be heard in any court, State or Federal. The fact that the man was acting under the color of this legislation was to be a complete answer to the suit. Whether he went beyond the legislation and did a willful, cruel, and malicious wrong to a man mattered not if this section had continued.

So I was gratified that we were able to reject the tenth section. That section undertook to strip the President of his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. I thought I knew the sentiment of the Senate upon that subject; that if we had agreed to that section the report could not have been adopted in this body. Whenever the question has been raised in the Senate the proposition to strip the President of a constitutional authority and to relieve him from constitutional duties has failed in the Senate. He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. We cannot say that he is less, nor take from him any power which he possesses rightfully as such commander.

So I was gratified that the eleventh section was stricken out, which undertook—I believe it might be expressed in a very few words—to lay a foundation for impeaching somebody; to declare that in any way to disregard the obligations of this law should be a misdemeanor and subject the person to punishment. What particular act should be punished was not defined; but any effort to interfere with the execution of this law by anybody should subject that party to a punishment for a misdemeanor. Of course the Senate could not agree to that. There are too many obvious reasons why they could not. Crime should be exactly and accurately defined, and it would be an odious thing to punish a man upon such a general description and definition of an offense as that. You would have to go beyond the limits of Europe to find such a definition of a crime, I think, as that. You would have to go into the despotisms of Asia. When a man is to be punished he is to be advised in advance what is the thing required of him or forbidden.

Mr. President, I did not intend to extend my remarks so far. I intended to say that I signed this report, not as expressing my individual views upon the several propositions, but as expressing, as far as I could ascertain, the pleasure of the majority of this body. I signed it in a representative capacity, the representative upon that committee of the pleasure of the Senate; and I think I am authorized to say that, with the exception of the section numbered twelve as it comes from the House and section thirteen as it comes from the House, the will of the Senate has prevailed in this report. I judge from the votes of the Senate that have been given for several days past.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to say in regard to this thirteenth section that as an independent proposition it does not meet my approbation. I should prefer that it was not in the report. But, sir, it was insisted upon by the conferees on the part of the House, and as has been stated by the Senator from Indiana there were other sections which the House had added to our bill that we thought of vital importance to have stricken out. This one I did not think would have any practical importance to defeat the operation of the bill. I think myself it was in bad taste to insert this section in it. I do not believe that without this section an officer charged with a duty, a civil officer acting as a judge at an election is to be bound by the opinions of anybody else. He should pay proper respect to the opinions of persons who are supposed to understand the questions which he is to decide and about which they express opinions; but if I was acting as a judge of an election, or as a justice of the peace, or in any other capacity where I had a discretion imposed upon me, I would not recognize the authority of anybody to bind me in giving a decision, though I should doubtless be disposed to follow the opinions of those who

I thought might understand the questions better than I did, if they did not disagree with my convictions of duty. But inasmuch as we thought there was no practical importance in the section to interfere with the operation of the bill, as the Senate had agreed to it, rather than have a disagreement with the House about it the conferees of the Senate agreed to the thirteenth section as it was amended. I think I am authorized in saying, not only for the Senator from Indiana, but also for my colleague from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that none of us would have preferred this thirteenth section, and it was only left in as a necessity to bring about an agreement between the two Houses, thinking it would do no special harm.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is mere smoke.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The twelfth section I think is not obnoxious now to any serious objection. It only applies to persons hereafter elected or appointed to office. The Senate will recollect and the Senator from Indiana will remember that under our original reconstruction act no person was to be eligible to office who would be disqualified for holding office under the provisions of the third article of our proposed constitutional amendment. The third clause of that proposed constitutional amendment would embrace the very parties who would be disqualified to take this oath, so that substantially there is no great importance in the twelfth section. For my own part I can say in reference to the twelfth section what I could not say as to the thirteenth. I would not allow a man to hold office or to be elected to office in these rebel States that could not take the oath.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, if this law is carried out without any interference on the part of the executive government the Senator from Indiana will not regret that he has signed the report of the conference committee. It is possible we might have framed better bills than these bills; but everybody in the rebel States can bear testimony to the wonderful effectiveness of the laws already passed, until the opinion of the Attorney General was given. The passage of this bill will complete the work, and I have the fullest confidence that it will be effective. I rise now to express the hope that throughout that part of our country men of all parties and of all sentiments and feelings will clearly understand that, if they comply with the terms and conditions of these three reconstruction laws honestly and faithfully, all obstacles will be removed, and they will be admitted into these Chambers. I think it is important that they should so understand these acts. The original law provides that if the terms and conditions are complied with faithfully, so that Congress shall be satisfied of it, they shall be entitled to representation; and if they elect men who can take the oath they shall be admitted into these Chambers. In my judgment all discussion, all doubt or question on this point operates against the friends of reconstruction. It is a common thing for those who are opposed to reconstruction on any terms, who would defeat what we have done, to charge us with insincerity and trifling. Let it be distinctly understood by all that these laws are passed by Congress to restore the rebel States and people to their practical relations; that if they comply with the conditions prescribed, Congress will redeem its pledge.

I should have preferred to have fixed a time for the expiration of the terms of those who are now in office, because ninety-nine out of a hundred of them cannot take the oath. But many of them have changed their sentiments and opinions, are faithful officers and good men, and the military commanders could have continued such men in office. If we had required them to take the oath the very best men among them would have been the men who would not have taken the oath. The Governor of Alabama, the other day, attended the convention in that State, and made an earnest speech in favor of reconstruction; and he committed himself fully to the policy of Congress. He is in Washington, and he brings me a letter from General Pope recommending that Congress shall remove his disabilities at once. It seems to be understood that we cannot enter upon the policy of removing disabilities until these States are reconstructed and their representatives admitted. Under this section, as it came from the House of Representatives, he would have to vacate his office; he could not take the oath; and so with some others who are earnest and devoted to the policy of Congress. The friends of reconstruction lose quite as much as the opponents of reconstruction by the exclusions from voting. I indulge the hope that this bill will complete the work, and that in the course of a few months or a twelvemonth these States will honestly comply with our terms and conditions. I have no doubt they will do so, and that a large majority of the men they send to the Senate and House of Representatives will be earnest, devoted Union men, in favor of the equal rights of all men, and who will think and speak and act as the majority of these two Chambers now think, speak, and act.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to say one word in regard to this bill and its general principles. I shall vote for it, as I did for the previous bills, because it proposes some method of adjusting our difficulties and restoring these States. I have, however, some objections to it. The first objection is that it is not the kind of bill which I think the Congress of the United States ought to have provided. I think they should have provided a civil government, not a military government. Secondly, starting with the proposition that the existing governments there are illegal governments, they are yet reserved as auxiliary, if not as primary, civil governments in this respect. They have the whole civil power of those communities in their hands. As we believe that power was placed in the hands of the enemies of the party that has triumphed in the war, it was our duty to take it out of their hands and to place it in the hands of our friends. To avoid any misconception in regard to this matter, I will say that I believe that the party in the majority should have organized civil governments there, placing the entire social and political power in the hands of our friends, and not in the hands of our enemies. Much fault has been found with the Executive; much denunciation has been heaped upon him for placing the political power there in the hands of his friends. But now, Congress, after taking the whole subject into their own hands, have thought proper to leave this entire organization as they found it; and hereafter the fault will be upon them, not upon the Executive.

There is another objection I have, because the measure is not sufficiently thorough; it does not go to the bottom of the subject. It places the freedmen entirely under the control of those who hold property. It is the duty of the Government of the United States to render the freedmen independent of the circumstances which surround them, so as to enable them to cast their votes independently of the property-holders, or landholders, who have a social and a political influence, which, when exerted upon them, is almost a necessary power compelling them to vote as it thinks proper. Any thorough measure of reconstruction should have provided for the freedmen, so as to render them independent of the proprietors. Notwithstanding these objections, however, I shall vote for the report, because it promises some method of reconstruction, and of restoring these States to the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but a word to say before casting my vote. When the original laws were before us I voted for them, for reasons which I then supposed to be satisfactory, and which certainly were satisfactory to my judgment; and I adhered to that vote when the bills were vetoed by the President. I have seen no reason since to regret that determination. I believed then—and I voted under that impression—that the effect of the bills would be that these States would soon be in the Union. I think now that they would be in the Union without this additional legislation, even as that legislation has been interpreted by the Attorney General. But the Senate entertain a different opinion; they suppose that the effect of that interpretation and the action which they anticipated would be taken by the Executive would interfere very materially with the execution of those laws; and they therefore thought proper to introduce and pass the bill which we acted upon yesterday. That has gone to the House in the shape of an amendment to a bill which the House had passed on the same subject; and the question for me now to decide is whether I will vote for or against the report of the committee of conference.

It is my purpose to vote for it. In voting for it, however, I do not abandon the opinion which I entertained when the subject was brought before us in the first instance, that the construction given by the Attorney General was in the main correct, and I have reason to believe that that is the view taken of it by most of the profession in the United States, including judges as well as gentlemen of the bar. But the question as it now stands before us is, as I think, whether it is proper for one who entertains the opinion which I do entertain to vote for the report of the committee or to vote against it. I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty to vote for it. If I should vote against it—and in advance I cannot tell necessarily what will be the vote of the Senate—and if the effect of that vote should be to defeat the report of the committee, then it might very naturally happen that a bill even more objectionable than his would have been if the amendments proposed by the House to our bill and which they have agreed to recede from, had been adopted by the committee.

I shall therefore, as I said just now, vote for the report of the committee, and I sincerely hope that this will be the last occasion when in the judgment of any member of Congress it will be deemed necessary to legislate upon this subject. It is high time that the Union should be restored as it was before the attempt at its disruption. It is in my view—and I say it with no intention of reproaching anybody—a reproach to the wisdom of the Government in all its departments that after we have terminated in the field this war, put an end to every effort to obstruct the execution of the laws, we should still be without a representation from ten of the States where the war was originally waged. I look therefore to a very early determination of that anomalous state of things; and when that shall have occurred, I shall look at an early period thereafter for a restoration of all the kind and fraternal feelings which Americans should feel for each other, and anticipate that the Union will be what it was when it was originally established, a union of hearts as well as a union of men.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I did not intend to say anything on this subject, and should not do so now if I were not required to go upon the record. I am very much surprised at the character of this report from the committee of conference. I had no expectation that our committee would have been able to obtain from the committee of the House so many concessions to those opinions which have heretofore obtained in the Senate. I think that the report is much more favorable than could have been reasonably expected, considering the constitution of the House branch of this committee of conference; and that in very many respects the results of the deliberations of the committee are worthy of commendation. But, sir, when I am to go upon the record on this report, when I am called upon to assent to the final passage of this measure, containing certain provisions upon which I have heretofore spoken, and which are abhorrent to my ideas in regard to the power of Congress and in regard to the public policy of the country, I am compelled to vote in the negative. I should not have undertaken myself to make up the record, but as it is to be made up, I think that my duty to myself and my public convictions require me to vote in the negative.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word on this subject, and I shall only say one or two words now. I regret very much that my colleague is not able to vote for this report. I am glad to arrive at any decision here which will bring this Union together again; and I have thought that was the desire of my colleague also. In my judgment if the executive officer of the Government had let well enough alone we should not have been called here now, and there would have been no necessity for another bill on this subject. I want the Union restored; but I want those people who have been in rebellion and who have brought all this trouble upon the country to know that they have done wrong. If they had been let alone after the surrender of Lee, I am sure it would not have been necessary for us to pass any of these bills that are called reconstruction bills. I think, too, that if their officious friends, their unwise friends, had let well enough alone since the last adjournment of Congress, it would have been better for them, and perhaps better for the country.

Now, sir, I vote for this measure with the desire that it shall be the end of our legislation on the subject; but if the people of the South are not content with the clemency of Congress, then I say I hope we shall come back again and give them something else. They have been rebels to the Government; they have tried to destroy it, and they had no right to expect the clemency with which Congress has treated them.

When I look back to the history of other countries I find that from the time of the Stuarts it was the Parliament which saved the liberties of the people; and I am satisfied now that it is the representatives of the people who are going to save the liberties of this country. I dislike all this mawkishness which we hear about constitutional questions. What mockery to hear prating about the Constitution from the mouths of those who have disregarded the Constitution; who sought not only to destroy the Constitution, but to destroy the whole country, and who, when they were in rebellion, did all they could to make themselves shameless before the world; who were not only disgraceful in their conduct, in their injuries to their fellow-citizens, but to the whole world. And these people have no claim to governmental rights except what the people of the North are willing to extend to them. I think one of the grandest spectacles which I ever read of in history has been that justice which has lately been meted out to a man who went down into Mexico to subvert the liberties of that country. I believe that if we had been a little more positive in our acts of justice at the close of this war we should not have had the trouble we now have.

I have only got to say, Mr. President, that I approve of this bill. I would have taken the bill of the Senate, or I would have taken the bill of the House. Either of them was strong enough for me. Either of them, I think, would save us from any further trouble. And I repeat again, if this does not satisfy the people who were in rebellion, I shall be willing to come back and try to legislate them into the Union.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I concede that the crimes of the people of the South have been very great, but I deny that the crimes of any portion of the people of the United States can increase the powers of Congress; and at the same time I maintain that it is not the people of the South alone who have committed crimes. Crimes have been committed by others besides the rebels.

I voted and spoke against the original bill, of which the measure under consideration is a supplement. I voted and spoke against the supplement that was passed in March to that original bill. If I had occupied the position of being a supporter of the original measure, and had voted for it, I should have felt myself free to vote for this measure; but when this measure is an aggravation of the original bill and of the supplemental bill, and its only purpose is to put down this noose tighter and more inexorably upon the people of the South, how can any man who voted against those original measures give his sanction to the present measure by voting for the adoption of this report of the committee of conference? This is the very question: whether the present supplemental bill shall become a law or shall fall? The vote of the Senate on this report decides that question. If we vote in favor of the report of the committee of conference we vote that the measure shall become a law. If we vote against the report of the committee of conference we vote practically and essentially to reject the measure.

Mr. President, it is not in any clemency to the people of the South that I have taken my course in relation to the policy of the late war and the measures which the Government adopted to put it down. It is for no purpose to benefit or to relieve them that I have pursued the course which I since thought proper to pursue; but my principles and course have been dictated by my understanding of the Constitution of our country, and by my devotion to that Constitution and to the liberties, not of the South, but of the whole people of the United States, including those of my own State. Sir, if I were to give this measure my sanction, with my convictions of its utter unconstitutionality and its total overthrow and destruction of American liberty, I should deem myself a base recreant, unworthy to be a member of the Senate, unworthy to be ranged as a friend of constitutional liberty.

Sir, I am not going to enlarge my remarks on this occasion, but I say that the people of the southern States have a right to self-government under the Constitution of the United States; and according to the principles of the Constitution they have that right at this time as ample and unquestioned, as little subject to interference by Congress, as has the State of Ohio or the State of Massachusetts. I utterly deny that Congress has any power to impose a government upon the ten States that were lately in rebellion. There is not a vestige of any such power in the Constitution; and so far as it has been exercised, according to the concession and in the words of the bold innovator in the House, it is a power outside of the Constitution and independent of the Constitution. Your idea of revolutionizing States, of conquering States, of clothing Congress or the whole Government of the United States with the powers of conquerors because they have constitutionally suppressed a rebellion in certain States, is preposterous in the last degree, and it is utterly inimical to all ideas of constitutional government and popular liberty. I think that is a position which never has been and never will be refuted. I denied a few days ago that Congress had any power to establish a military government. I again, in a word, repeat that position. Congress has committed the double enormity not only of usurping the power of ten States to establish their own governments, but of infringing upon the constitutional authority of the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief to see to the establishment of order in a conquered territory.

But, sir, I merely got up to protest that I believe that consistency and principle and the highest sense of duty require me and every man who is a member of either House of Congress, and who believes that the original measure was unconstitutional, to vote against this and all other measures proposed as subsidiary to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 81, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Cole,

Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Norton, and Patterson of Tennessee—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—16.

So the report was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE FOR COLORED CITIZENS.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senate has completed one important work; and I now move that the rule will be so far suspended as to authorize the proceeding with the consideration of Senate bill No. 124.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is it?

Mr. SUMNER. The bill that was ruled out of order last night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There have been so many ruled out of order that we do not know by that mere statement what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a bill to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am under the impression that that bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee and never reported back.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is on the Calendar reported back with the request of that committee to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think this is not one of those bills. I have no recollection of its ever having been considered by the committee, and I think so important a bill ought certainly to receive the serious and careful consideration of some committee. If the bill has been reported back, I think it was an inadvertence.

Mr. SUMNER. My motion is that rule of July 5 be suspended, so as to allow the consideration of Senate bill No. 124.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator has not stated the title, nor has it been read by the Clerk at the desk. I trust, therefore, the Senator will explain to us the provisions of the bill, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. I take it the Senator is aware of the provisions of the bill. It was explained last night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to a question of order. It is that the resolution adopted by the Senate cannot be suspended as a rule of the Senate might be by unanimous consent. That resolution became the law of the body for this session, and it cannot be disturbed except by a motion to reconsider, and the time for a reconsideration has passed.

Mr. CONKLING. Or on one day's notice the rule may be changed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it is an ordinary rule of the Senate, which can be changed on one day's notice. It is a resolution, which stands as a fixed law of the body for the session, and can be only disturbed by a motion of reconsideration. Therefore the motion of the Senator to suspend it is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I know of no process by which a rule of the Senate can be suspended by a two-thirds vote, as is done in the other House in regard to the rules of that body. I believe a rule allowing such a vote of suspension has never prevailed in the Senate. By unanimous consent we supersede our rules frequently, but in no other way. In order to rescind or modify a rule one day's notice previously must be given. I do not think this motion is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I give notice that to-morrow or the next day I shall move to suspend the rule of the Senate so far as to allow the consideration of this special bill.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 134, making an appropriation for the execution of the laws providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Finance Committee, if it is not a very unusual thing to originate an appropriation bill in the Senate? I know the constitutional provision does not extend to it; but I ask whether it is not a very unusual thing, whether it is not a departure from the uniform practice, to originate an appropriation bill in the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] is not here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I will make the inquiry of the Senator from Maine, who is, with me, on a question of that sort as good authority now as if he were chairman.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, there is no constitutional objection to originating an appropriation bill in this body, because the constitutional provision applies only to bills for raising revenue, and not to bills appropriating revenue. Within my recollection, at one session the Senate concluded that in order to advance business they would originate one of the general appropriation bills, although the custom had been to have them originate in the other House. That was done, and the bill was sent down to the House; but the House objected to it, and laid it on the table, and I think immediately adopted it as their own, originating there as a new bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. The House has uniformly objected to our taking any such course.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have uniformly objected to it, and claimed the sole right to originate such bills themselves. But we are in the habit every day of originating appropriations here for specific purposes, not the general appropriation bills. I do not see any objection to originating this bill in the Senate, and I presume the other House will take no exception to it, as it appropriates a sum of money for a specific purpose. There is really no constitutional objection to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was quite aware that the constitutional provision extended only to revenue bills; but I felt at the same time very sure that the Senate was not in the habit of originating appropriation bills. It has been the understanding, I think, from the foundation of the Government that those bills ought to originate in the popular branch of the Legislature when the members come directly from the tax-paying people. I do not think there is a sufficient reason now to depart from a principle that the House has insisted upon whenever the question has been presented. I suppose, however, there is no rule under which objection can be made; but upon this ground I shall vote against taking up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to take up Senate bill No. 184 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WILSON. The bill was laid over last night for the purpose of getting the estimates. I have now received them, and I send the letter containing them to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, July 9, 1867.

Sir: The undersigned, to whom the subject has been referred, have the honor to report that a further appropriation of $1,648,277 would appear from the estimates received to be possibly necessary to complete the work of reconstruction in the rebel States under the acts of Congress of March 2 and 23, 1867; the original appropriation for this object ($500,000, by joint resolution of March 30, 1867), having been distributed to the respective districts, as follows:

First district.....	$69,444 44
Second district.....	69,444 45
Third district.....	97,222 22
Fourth district.....	97,222 22
Fifth district.....	166,666 67
	<hr/> $500,000 00

It appears by the estimate transmitted that a further large amount is requisite, as follows:
First district, estimate for further sum necessary to complete.....	$80,000 00
Second district, same.....	461,806 00
Third district, same.....	27,778 00
Fourth district, estimates to July 1, in addition to the amount ($97,222 22) already supplied.....	245,539 00
Fifth district, estimates for one month dated April 17, for $243,420, of which $166,666 67 have already been supplied, leaving a remainder called for.....	76,753 00
Total.....	<hr/> $891,875 00

Total.....$891,875 00

If General Ord's (fourth district) registrars, estimated for to the 1st of July only, should be continued on duty under pay to the end of July, then there should be added to the above the expenses for that month, at the rates of compensation stated in his estimate, the sum of $159,781, and if continued to the end of August double that sum—$319,562.

The same, likewise, of General Sheridan's district, (fifth), whose estimate received is for one month only. If the monthly expenses continue for a period of two months at the rate stated they will amount to the further sum of $218,420. If for three months, to $436,840.

These figures give the sum of $1,648,277 as possibly required, but dependent upon contingencies which cannot now be determined.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

B. W. BRICE,

Paymaster General.

E. D. TOWNSEND,

Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the chairman of the committee if that recommendation is sanctioned by the Secretary of War?

Mr. WILSON. I suppose it is. I have here a note signed by General Schriver. I was at the War Department yesterday morning and the Secretary of War placed the document which has been read in my hands. I handed it back to him, and he said that he would send it down yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Apparently it is from the Paymaster General.

Mr. WILSON. It is a report of the Paymaster General and the Adjutant General to the Secretary of War of the amount necessary for the purpose; but just now I received from the War Department a letter of General Schriver inclosing this report from the War Department, signed by these officers as their estimate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. General Schriver is the chief officer of the Department.

Mr. JOHNSON. We are never in the habit of appropriating on estimates from subordinate officers.

Mr. WILSON. There were certain estimates made by persons in these offices, and the papers were all referred to the Adjutant General and the Paymaster General for them to make up the estimate of what would be necessary to be done, and this report was made to the Secretary of War and is sent here by General Schriver. Why it was not signed by the Secretary I do not know. It was in his hands yesterday because he handed it to me to read.

Mr. JOHNSON. For one, I should like to have the sanction of the Secretary of War. I should not like to vote such a sum as this without the sanction of the head of the Department. At the last session it was supposed that $500,000 would be amply sufficient for the execution of the law. Now we are asked to appropriate over sixteen hundred thousand dollars upon the mere estimate of the Paymaster General's department. Why it should be now necessary, when the matter is about to be brought to a close, and the registration is to close everywhere, I believe, in November, to appropriate $1,600,000 more I am at a loss to imagine. It may be right; and I am not to be considered as wishing to oppose any necessary appropriation to carry out these laws; but I think the Senate ought to have the opinion of the Secretary of War on the subject before they act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I quite agree with the Senator from Maryland in his view about this matter. I have no doubt that more money is necessary, because all these officers say so; but it strikes me that it is very unwise to proceed in this manner without having any recommendation from the President or from the Secretary of War, who is the head of the Department. The Secretary of War should examine the estimate so far as to give his sanction to it, to say the least, before we are called upon to act. Here we have a letter from an officer of the War Department, a bureau officer merely, inclosing this communication, which is founded simply upon the statement of the five district commanders that they want so much money, as near as they can guess. That they may want more I have no doubt, and that they think they want this sum, possibly, I do not question. You will notice the expression of the Paymaster General is repeated, "possibly this sum may be necessary."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon the length of time the registration is kept open.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may or may not be necessary to appropriate so much. We have got into very loose habits on the subject of appropriations lately.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Massachusetts has handed me the letter of General Schriver, and as I am a very good reader of bad writing I think when I read this to the Senate it will relieve the objection that this is not by order of the Secretary of War. With the leave of the Senate I will read it:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 13, 1867.

Sir: I send herewith a detailed estimate by the Adjutant General and Paymaster General of the appropriation required for the carrying out of the reconstruction acts, agreeably to your verbal request of this morning.

By order of the Secretary of War:

ED. SCHRIVER, Inspector General.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, United States Senate.

I should infer, therefore, that Mr. Schriver would not write this letter unless the Secretary told him.

Mr. CONKLING. I have just been informed by a member of the House, who has come directly from that body, that the Secretary of War, in response to their resolution, has sent a communication to the House giving estimates, which he supposes are identical with these, but, at all events, giving estimates in detail on this subject. That communication has been referred to what is called there the Committee of Reconstruction, which, under the resolution of the House raising it, has the right to report at any time. As that committee will no doubt report back something, and as the usage is for such bills to originate in the other House, I suggest for the consideration of the Senator from Massachusetts whether or not he will govern his management of this bill accordingly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that this is all right. I presume it to be so; I have no doubt that the officers think it is all right; my objection is that when we appropriate sums of money, and especially large sums of money, we should have at least a recommendation in writing from the head of the Department, signed by his own hand; otherwise we act without any responsibility. It seems my friend from Massachusetts took from the Secretary of War a statement that so much money was wanted by these officers, a verbal statement, and he prepares a bill upon that. We have no record here of a recommendation by the Secretary of War. All we have is a letter from General Schriver saying that he sends this estimate here. That may be all very well; but we ought to have the data on which this calculation is founded before making the appropriation. If to-day was the last day, and we were about adjourning, and there was a pressure upon us, I should be willing, perhaps, with my belief that all is right, to waive the ordinary course of proceeding; but as the matter is before the other House, I suggest to my friend from Massachusetts whether he had not better let this bill lie over until Monday, so that we may, at any rate, keep up the form of doing business regularly and in accordance with precedent.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to the bill going over. I will simply say that the estimate was sent here to-day, by order of the Secretary of War, by General Schriver. I do not know why it is that the Secretary did not sign the paper himself and send it in the usual form. But I understand the Secretary has sent the same estimates to the House of Representatives, and his communication has been referred to the committee there, and no doubt it will be promptly acted upon. I have no objection to waiting until we hear from the House, and therefore I will move that for the present, at any rate, the bill lie upon the table, unless the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who appears anxious to obtain the floor, desires to say something.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to say a word.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CAMERON. I am glad to find that the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to let this bill lie over, for to my mind this is a most irregular proceeding. The whole thing is wrong. In the first place an appropriation of a very large sum of money is asked, and there is no detailed estimate. The whole statement is made by irresponsible persons. The Secretary of War, knowing as he does what is right, knowing what is the courtesy due to Congress, familiar as a business man with the proper mode of proceeding, ought not to allow his subordinates to send a statement of this kind here, because we cannot hold him responsible for it, nor can we hold the President responsible for such a recommendation. Estimates like this should come from the responsible head of the Department.

Sir, while I am up I will take this occasion to say that we must very soon change our notions in regard to sums of money. During the war we got up from millions to hundreds of millions and thousands of millions, and I do not know but that if it had continued a little longer we should have gone to hundreds of thousands of millions of dollars. We have got to stop wasteful expenditure. We must in the first place husband our means. We must in some way or other collect our revenue in a better manner than we are doing now. I think the country will find when the statement of this year is made out, that the money raised by revenue is much less than it was last year. I think much of this is due to the extravagance which the war, naturally perhaps, brought upon us.

I felt inclined to say something more about this matter; but as the Senator from Massachusetts has withdrawn his motion for the present consideration of the bill, I shall reserve what I have to say to a future time. I am glad it is withdrawn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This bill was laid over yesterday at my instance. What I desired to obtain by the delay of this bill was not a mere statement from the Paymaster General that gross amounts were needed for the administration of the reconstruction laws, but some statement of the objects upon which this disbursement was to be made. In the paper which has been read we are simply told that certain gross sums have been expended in particular districts, naming them, and that certain additional sums are called for by the military commanders in those respective districts. There is no statement furnished us in detail pointing out the purposes or objects for which the outlays already incurred have been made; nor is there any statement of the objects or purposes for which the money is asked. So far as we know the committee that reported this bill have made no investigation into the facts to ascertain whether the money that has been already expended has been properly applied to legitimate purposes, whether there is any suggestion or any possibility of improvident outlays in the expenditure hitherto incurred.

In connection with the statement which has been read we ought also to have the different districts and their commanders mentioned. In this paper there was nothing to distinguish them but their numbers. I cannot remember what constitutes the first district, though I believe Virginia is in that district—

Mr. WILSON. Virginia is the first district,

North and South Carolina the second, Alabama, Georgia and Florida the third, Arkansas and Mississippi the fourth, and Louisiana and Texas the fifth.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That statement, then, will enable us to understand the paper which has been read so far as the statement applies to the numbering of the respective districts; but I think the Senator from Massachusetts, before he asks us on a future occasion (as this bill is now to go over) to vote this large sum of money, ought to be able to explain to us the purposes for which it is applied. I suppose that the payment of our military officers in that section of the country and the payment of our troops employed there is out of the general appropriation for the War Department, and consequently these special appropriations must be applied to some other object besides the payment of officers and privates that are discharging their duties there, and I think the country ought to know how this money has been applied and expended and how this additional large sum which is to be appropriated is to be applied. He ought to have some idea of the demand for the purpose of paying persons appointed to take the registry of voters, and what sum will probably be demanded to pay the election officers who are to hold the election.

Now, sir, let it be understood that under the existing reconstruction laws there is large discretion left to these military commanders. We have not regulated them; we have not limited them with reference to what acts they may perform in carrying out those laws. There is no restraint, therefore, left in our hands except that which may be exercised over the appropriation of money, and we ought to require from these officers a statement of what they have been doing, and of what they propose to do, when they ask us to vote to them such large masses of the public money. We have no power or control or regulation over these disbursements except what we may exercise in voting appropriations. Everything else has been left to their discretion without regulation, without check or limit.

These considerations I think will appeal to the Senate to demand of the committee when this measure is again brought before us a full exhibit, a luminous statement, giving us some account of how our money is expended, and how it is proposed to be used.

Mr. DAVIS. It would seem that this want of the Military Department has sprung up very suddenly. On the 6th of this month the subject of the exposed condition of the northwestern frontier of the United States was under debate, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in that debate made use of these remarks:

"Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say in regard to this matter of the protection of the frontiers which has been alluded to here to-day, that I went this morning to see the Secretary of War, and I asked him if he desired any legislation whatever in regard to that or any subject in his Department. He said he desired nothing whatever; they had everything they wished for except one thing, and that he proposed to send in on Monday—the estimates for carrying out our reconstruction measures in the South. They want a further appropriation of money for that purpose; but as regards legislation for the protection of the frontier or any other matters of public defense he asked nothing whatever. Therefore so far as that is concerned he asks nothing of us, and I do not know that anybody proposes anything in that regard."

It appears to me that if the head of the War Department wanted this large sum of money to establish a Radical party in the southern States, and to subjugate the southern States, he ought to have been prepared with his estimates at the beginning of this session. It seems the Secretary of War has his eye directed pretty much, if not exclusively, upon this work of reconstruction. We have all listened to the statement of the Indian depredations on the northwestern frontier, of their extent, and of their threatening character. The Secretary is entirely oblivious in relation to all the proper, legitimate, and imperative demands upon the Government of the United States, and upon its Treasury; but when the matter is the reconstruction of the southern States, the establishment of a Radical party in the southern States, that will subjugate that people and force upon them a government odious, oppressive, and grinding, the Secretary holds in reserve his right to ask an estimate for that purpose; and when the estimate is presented it amounts to $1,648,277. If half a million dollars were thought a sufficient expenditure of Government money for this purpose when the original measure was passed, what sudden and great exigencies have arisen since to require more than three times the amount originally asked?

Sir, the war-whoop of the Sioux and other wild bands of the West may awake the slumbers of the women and children on that defenseless frontier, as has been the case for months, and the Secretary of War hears nothing of it; and when gentlemen here appeal by facts, appalling in their character, to the Government to come to the rescue of your suffering frontier, and to relieve helpless women and children from the scalping-knife and the tomahawk, the Secretary of War has no appropriation to ask for, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has no appropriation to ask for. But when this scheme of subjugating the southern States and providing for the aggrandizement and the aggregation of the power of the Radical party is made the issue, the Government and its high officials turn their backs callously, coldly, without any sensation at all, upon this scene of blood and savage warfare that is being enacted in the Northwest, and they can come up here and ask three times the original amount appropriated to be added to a corruption fund—a fund intended to enforce the laws of the United States that deprive the people of ten States of their right of self-government.

Mr. President, before this sum, so large in amount, so enormously in excess of the original amount, is devoted to a purpose not only questionable, but in my mind altogether atrocious, it seems to me that the most precise and exact estimates should be demanded from the Department, that the particular purposes for which this aggregate sum, and all its purposes, in detail by precise amounts, ought to be set forth in the estimates.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the War Department has the appropriations for the Army for the year to use in any part of the country in support of the Army. They do not ask us for money for the Army in any direction. They have got abundance of it. Therefore when I asked the Secretary of War if he desired any legislation he answered properly that he had nothing to ask either in men or money. There has been a strong pressure to raise some troops for the frontier and General Sherman has been teased into recommending four regiments of mounted men, and on the strength of his letter I have offered a bill which the Secretary has not asked for, and I do not think General Grant has asked for, and from what I hear I do not think the Senate will pass it.

Now, I wish simply to say to the Senator from Kentucky that these Indian outrages do not compare with the outrages that have been perpetrated in the southern section of the country within the last year. There have been ten murders there to one by the Indians. His own State, too, must be included as one in which these outrages have occurred. There are very few parts of the country where there have been more of them than there. For one I desire to suppress Indian outrages and all other kinds of outrages, and have law and order and justice and humanity prevail in every portion of the country. I suppose we all agree in that respect; certainly we ought to do so.

Now, sir, as to this particular sum the Secretary has sent under his own name a statement to the House of Representatives of what he desires, and when we receive their bill we shall see whether there are any further details than there are on the paper which has been read. I do not suppose there are; but if there be we shall have the benefit of them. I suppose we all want to spend just as little as we possibly can. The Secretary said to me the other day when I called on him for information, as has been read, that he was having the estimates made out and the requisitions examined carefully by the Paymaster General and the Adjutant General, and he thought he would be able to send in the estimate on last Monday. It appears, however, it has just come in to-day. Whether the statement sent to the House is any more in detail than this report of these two officers I do not know. I shall be glad to see just where every dollar goes in this matter, as I would in everything else. I certainly think it is among the first and highest duties of Congress to be careful in appropriations. I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on that point.

I now move that this measure lie on the table for the present with a view of waiting for the bill from the House of Representatives, which they will undoubtedly send to us in a short time, and then we shall have the benefit of any statement of facts which may have been made to them.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw his motion for a moment to enable me to say a few words.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to accommodating the gentlemen, and I withdraw the motion.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 128) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the greatest fictions of this day, in my judgment, are the stories that have been retailed in Congress of wrongs and crimes committed in the southern States against negroes and Union men. So far as my own State is concerned I know it to be so; notwithstanding every once in a while an utterance escapes the Senators from Massachusetts that indicates that their purpose is to reconstruct Kentucky. I will read what was said by the honorable Senator who is at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SUMNER] upon this subject on the 5th instant, as it is not long. In the course of his remarks he said to the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON:]

"Communicate with your late colleague upon this floor, that able and patriotic Senator, Mr. Creswell. Listen to his testimony. There can be no doubt that the Unionists, whether black or white, in Maryland, require your protection. Give it to them. Do not leave them a prey to rebels. They are exposed in the same way in Kentucky. Here is a letter which I have from a distinguished citizen of that State, dated July 1, and I read these, out of many others, simply because they are the latest; they have come within a few hours. I read as follows:

"I hope you will be able to do good at the extra session, and extend and protect the rights of the freedmen, as they are sadly in need of it in Kentucky. Reconstruct us. This is the only loyal hope."

Now for the comment of the Senator on this false and most infamous communication:

"Such is the cry. Kentucky needs reconstruction, and it is your duty to provide it. Put it on an equality with the rebel States. Let her colored citizens enjoy the full-blown rights of citizens, and let the white Unionists there have the protection of their votes. You sent muskets once. Send votes now."

Now, I say to both the Senators from Massachusetts, that the whole black population of Kentucky are better protected and more secure in their rights than are the white people of Massachusetts. My own county was one of the largest slaveholding counties in that State, the second in number. I know that county, and I know its population, white and black, very generally, and I know that there is not a community in the United States where there is more of order, of security, of protection to life and person and property than in that county, and I believe in the State of Kentucky generally. As in all communities, these rights in ours are sometimes violated; but very frequently. The wretch who from Kentucky could send to the Senator from Massachusetts such an invocation for the reconstruction of his State upon the model of the southern States, is a base calumniator of the land that gave him birth or protection, or both, and I dare the Senator to give his name to the Senate. I care not what his name is, I say here, and I will say to him when I can know and confront him that he is a vile calumniator of the noble State which his residence dishonors.

Mr. President, there are a few unclean birds in Kentucky, office-seekers, heretofore, and now Treasury rats, that have not the ability, character, and popularity to obtain office and salary by popular suffrage, who hovered upon the skirts of the Army during the war, and wish that Army to be organized again that they may still feed and fatten upon its offal; and the writer of this missive I doubt not is one of them, or of kin to them. Sir, how magisterially the Senator from Massachusetts speaks of reconstruction, and reconstructing Kentucky! The loyalty of Kentucky to the Constitution of the United States, and to the Union under that Constitution, now and heretofore, would shame that of Massachusetts; and in its extent, its intensity, its purity, and its universality among the people, is incomparably greater than that of this old and most malcontent, insubordinate, seditious, and traitorous State of Massachusetts.

Mr. President, Massachusetts was once a great and noble State, and had a great and noble people. She once had great principles and great objects. No people of their numbers ever did more for constitutional government and popular liberty than the people of Massachusetts did in the era of the Revolution. But from the acquisition of Louisiana, Massachusetts has been disloyal generally; and we have seen her people in flagrant rebellion against the laws and authorities of the United States. Treason not only hung upon the skirts of that Commonwealth, but covered it all over as with a cloak in the war of 1812. If the sentiments, principles, rules, and precedents which her Senators have aided in putting upon the people of the southern States, and which with whetted appetites they are impatient to fix upon Kentucky, had been let loose upon the people of Massachusetts at the close of the war of 1812, in a spirit fierce and reckless as that of her Senators toward the southern States and Kentucky at this time, Massachusetts as a State would have been obliterated from the Union. But the able and pure men of that day knew that vile a sinner as she was, the law and measure of her responsibility was the Constitution of the United States; and although covered all over with treason, dishonor, and shame, still she was to exist as a State of the United States, and with all her political power unshorn so long as our system of government continued.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts himself has been complicated in the crime of treason. After the Supreme Court and all the courts of America before which that law came for adjudication, had pronounced it to be constitutional and valid, he had the audacity to declare, publicly and repeatedly, that he would resist its execution. He has been charged on the floor of the Senate with having been in council with an armed organization in Massachusetts, formed for no other purpose than to resist the execution of that law; and with having counseled that organization, after the law had been sustained by all the courts, to rescue a slave who was in the custody of the United States marshal, and that rescue was made in conformity with that Senator's counsel, and resulted in the rescue of the fugitive and the murder of the marshal. The Senator remained mute because the charges were true.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. I am alluding to the Senator behind the Senator who has now addressed the Chair. Mr. President, Massachusetts now is in high feather. Why? She feels conscious and proud that the Constitution of the United States is prostrate at her feet; and that she is leading the whole Radical host of America to execute her wild, oppressive, and unconstitutional behests. The affairs of men are very changeable. The time may come when the tables may be turned upon Massachusetts; and I tell you, reading and interpreting from her history, that whenever that change does come, and the principles and precedents which she has been so potent to establish are brought against her, she will be disloyal again, and sedition, insurrection, and treason will again mark her course.

The Senator from Massachusetts pretends to be a statesman and sets up to speak in this Chamber, not only to the Senate, not only to the people of the United States, but to the legislators and statesmen and publicists of Europe; and he gravely proposes that Congress, that is that he, shall reconstruct Kentucky. If the men who framed our Constitution could come into this Chamber and listen to such wild and incoherent invocations to demolish their great work as we so frequently hear from that Senator, we might well fancy their amazement to see it given over to such a keeper. Sir, if reconstruction of Kentucky and Massachusetts were possible, both the Senator and his State would be incomparably a fitter subject than Kentucky. The Senator talks not only flippantly, but with the extravagance of a monomaniac, as if he fancied himself the autocratic law-giver of the whole land; as though he was a great Colossus in wisdom and power, bestriding Government, Constitution, and country. He is impatient, ardent to reconstruct Kentucky, and suggests that this session shall continue for that work. Sir, I wish that before the sun sets the Senator from Massachusetts and myself could meet alone upon the soil of Kentucky, and he there to reconstruct it, and no interference, we all alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have never had a principle or a sentiment or a purpose or an affection of my soul that was not in strict loyalty to the Constitution of the United States and to the Union under that Constitution. I intend to cherish those principles and sentiments, and the last regret of my life will be that the madness of party ever imperiled the Union and this Constitution and brought upon them ruin and chaos, from which I fear they will never be extricated.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I say nothing about Massachusetts. Her history and her character will speak for her. I shall say something, however, of Kentucky. I have in my hands a newspaper which I have received this morning, which contains the account of a celebration of the Fourth of July at Lexington. Is not that a town in Kentucky? I read therefore, for what I say, only Kentucky authority. On that occasion one speaker, whom many on this floor know as an excellent gentleman—Judge Goodloe—said:

"He wanted the negroes to have the right to vote and sit on juries, and he believed they soon would be found in both places."

Then came another speaker, Willard Davis, who makes an elaborate, able, compact, forcible address, and any Senator on this floor might covet the ability to make such an address as is made by Mr. Willard Davis, of Kentucky. In the course of his address, Mr. Willard Davis, of Kentucky, says to his audience:

"What is your property and your lives worth without the means of that complete protection derived from the enforcement of all those legal remedies enjoyed by your white neighbors? The present law of Kentucky regarding testimony in your case is mere mockery of justice."

Strong words for a Kentuckian—a mere mockery of justice. Surely a State which has such laws needs a little reconstruction. Then the Kentucky orator proceeds to say:

"This is a monstrous wrong, and I believe the next Legislature will remove it. I know that undue prejudice against your race has shed its damning blight like mildew over our whole political fabric; that it stands to-day in our midst like the poisonous Bohan Upas, infusing decay and death into every nerve and sinew of the body-politic; that it has affected alike our unwary youth and mature and reflective age. But I will not despair of our own people."

Such is the voice of a patriot Kentuckian. He then proceeds, in another place, to say:

"The right to act for yourself, or to say who shall act for you, is higher than all human law, and no State can deprive a freeman of this right and be republican in fact."

Such is the voice of a Kentucky patriot speaking on Kentucky soil.

"No government can be just and deprive any portion of her citizens of this right. In this respect suffrage is a natural right; the age at which you may exercise it is political, and may be altered or amended, and so may a State fix qualifications, but the great original right to vote at some time remains, and cannot be taken from freemen except by despotic force."

Such is the voice of a patriot Kentuckian speaking in his own State. Then comes another Kentuckian, a colored orator, the Rev. G. H. Graham, from whose speech I will read but one brief sentence:

"Sires, grant us justice." [Continued cheering.]

This was on Kentucky soil. Does not Kentucky need reconstruction?

That is not all. The most elaborate speech of the occasion was made by a Major General of the Army of the United States, General Brislin, who vindicates the power of Congress to confer suffrage in Kentucky. He says:

"To go back a little, suffrage to you, black people of Kentucky, is not so much a question of right as it is one of how you shall get it." [Cries of hear, hear.]

That is in Kentucky.

"I have always believed that Congress had full power over the question of suffrage, not only in the seceded States, but in all the States of this Union. [Cheers.] I contend that Congress may enfranchise your people in Kentucky any time it chooses to do so." [Loud cheers.]

This was in Kentucky. The orator proceeds:

"Congress may do it—

First. Under that provision of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, which requires and empowers Congress to make all appropriate legislation to secure the objects intended by the abolition of slavery, namely, the perfect liberty, equality, protection, and freedom of all the people.

Second. Under that clause of the Constitution which requires Congress to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

Mark, Mr. President, this is a Kentucky orator, celebrating the Fourth of July in Kentucky; and what does he say? I am not speaking now; it is a Kentucky orator that is speaking:

"Certainly it cannot be said with any degree of truth that a State which disfranchises nearly one third of its adult male population has a republican form of government. Under the Constitution Congress has power, and in good time I believe will secure to the people, irrespective of color, all their republican rights, among which is the right of suffrage." [Loud cheers.]

Kentucky cheers when it was announced that without the right of suffrage there was not a republican government. The orator then says:

Third. As we make no discrimination on account of color in claiming the allegiance of our people, so we must make no discrimination in according to them protection. It is a principle of nations that allegiance and protection go together, the one being the consideration of the other. As we claim allegiance from the blacks, we are bound to accord them full protection in all their rights as citizens, both civil and political." [Cheers.]

Kentucky cheers that sentiment. The orator proceeds:

Fourth. Congress may extend the suffrage under the well established and just principle of our Government that taxation and representation go together." [Cheers.]

Kentucky cheers again.

Fifth. Congress may do it as a measure of national safety. The men who are engaged in or sympathized with rebellion must not be allowed to become the governing class in any part of this country." [Continued cheering.]

Kentucky cheering.

"State lines make no difference in the offense of treason. Geographical position cannot shield the people from the liabilities of our rebellion. Technical loyalty in the face of absolute treason will not avail. Punishment for rebellion in one State and immunities and privileges to it in another is not only devoid of reason and principle, but unjust." [Cheers.]

Kentucky cheers.

"There stand the men who were with me at Saltville," [cheers.]

the orator proceeds—a brave general of our Army—

"who, out of four hundred engaged in the battle, left one hundred and seventeen of their number dead and wounded on the rugged hillsides. [Cries of 'oh.'] Shall they be deprived of the ballot while the rebels against whom they fought, whose hands are yet red with the blood of the loyal, who murdered our poor captive colored soldiers, are allowed to vote." [Cries of "No, no."]

Kentucky cries, those!

"Such injustice—f forbid it Almighty God! The voices of the dead who fell contending for the Union, the maimed and battle-scarred bodies of the living appeal to us by every consideration of honor and duty to do justice to these men and secure them all the rights of citizenship. When this nation ceases to honor and protect the soldiers who in the hour of great public peril bared their breasts and shed their blood in defense of the Union, then indeed will it be undeserving of the favor of God or the support of man." [Cries of "True, true."]

Kentucky cries! The orator proceeds:

"In addition to what I have already said, I might adduce many other reasons why Congress should extend you the franchise, but let these for the present suffice."

"Why Congress should extend you the franchise;" in other words, reconstruct Kentucky. Then the orator proceeds:

"The power of Congress over this question clearly exists; your patriotic services demand this reward at the hands of a just Government, and I have no doubt but that before the end of the present year our liberty-loving Congressmen will fearlessly do their duty and give the ballot to every adult black man in Kentucky." [Continued cheering.]

Ay, sir, there is the true voice of Kentucky. Let that voice answer the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a word in reply. The Senator reads from speeches pronounced on a Fourth of July celebration at Lexington, the chief interior town of the State of Kentucky. There were present about ten thousand negroes and all the allies of negro equality that could be summoned up from the adjacent counties. The Senator has ostentatiously read from the speeches on that occasion; but those speeches are like his in the Senate, much sound and little else in them. They prove one thing though, that a perfect freedom of speech exists without interruption in the State of Kentucky. Now, suppose that such a meeting as that had taken place in the South, and men advocating the right of the southern people to self-government, and opposed to the usurpations of Congress upon that right, had got up such a meeting and made similar speeches on their side to those which the Senator has read—speeches that were made by negro and abolition orators in Lexington, Kentucky—what would have been the fate of such a meeting and the advocates of the southern people who were there to address it? The Freedmen's Bureau and all of its bloodhounds, the five military satraps and their myrmidons, would have been after them in a crusade, hissed on by the howl of the Senator from this Chamber. No, Mr. President, the people of the South are enslaved; they are enslaved by the usurped power of the Senator from Massachusetts in part, and he knows it; they feel it; the nation knows it; and the world looks upon it in abhorrence and astonishment. Mr. President, let me read now one or two—no, I will not read.

I was going to read an account of two or three atrocities, revolting and sickening to the human soul, perpetrated in the South by negroes upon white families, whole white families, father, mother, daughters, and grandchildren. They are horrible to read; they are of daily occurrence; they come up to the knowledge of the Senator from Massachusetts by every mail, and he never utters a word in condemnation or to memorialize any such crimes on the part of the freedmen; but whenever any incident of outrage or injustice upon a negro anywhere in the former slave States is enacted, he bores the Senate with a narration of it day after day. But, Mr. President, the facts which the Senator gives from his anonymous correspondents are false so far as they regard Kentucky. I reiterate the charge, that his correspondent who wrote him an infamous missive, asking the reconstruction of Kentucky according to the plan of the military acts of Congress, is a vile and cowardly calumniator. He utters nothing but foul falsehood and he knows it, and that is the cause why he skulks under the shelter of an anonymous letter.

Mr. SUMNER. Not an anonymous letter.

Mr. DAVIS. A letter whose writer is not known is anonymous. Sir, when a man writes me an anonymous letter I throw it in the fire and say nothing about it. If he desires me to conceal his name and his shame, his cowardice, and calumny, I scorn him. The lowest of all degradation is for a Senator to submit to become the conduit of the vile falsehoods of those who are so cowardly as to impose the condition to conceal his name to escape the infamy that would attach to it if it were known. "And what is to be thought of a Senator who revels in such a vocation?" The Senator read some bold declamation of Fourth of July orators in relation to the constitution of Kentucky and its civil polity and the great principles in the Constitution of the United States. What do those men know about the Constitution of the United States and its proper operation? Almost as little as the Senator from Massachusetts himself. Reconstructing Kentucky! If justice could overtake the States of this Union, Massachusetts would be reconstructed and brought to greater shame than even South Carolina. The honorable Senator was almost in an ecstasy a few days ago when he foretold the advent of negro Senators into this body. He was jubilant; and I thought, to increase his beatitude, he would have proposed to have resigned his seat that the Governor of Massachusetts should send some negro here to fill it. Well, if anything in the world could reconcile my people and myself to negro representation it would be such an exchange. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have no sympathy with the rebels. Their action was as much in opposition to my principles and sentiments and they did me as much wrong as any other man. I have condemned their course, and I still do from the inmost recesses of my soul; but, sir, my aversion to their crime shall never make me a usurper, shall never make me disregard my oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall never pervert my reason to the overthrow of that Constitution, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts acts daily. This idea and this charge of tyranny and oppression upon the people of Kentucky to the negro population, whether slave or free, is without foundation, and the honorable Senator himself ought to know it. I have seen him on an excursion into that State. He was then, and his principles were then, as odious to our people as they now are; and when I speak of a contest between myself and that Senator I had no reference to discourteous treatment to him. I believe he never received it there.

He could come to Kentucky, and could there make, day after day, such speeches as he does here, and not be molested. Why, sir, a miserable, miscreant tool of radicalism, lower than any that I know, who boasts to be a citizen and a native of that State, Samuel McKee, does it daily. I heard him in the last canvass, and there never was greater freedom—licentiousness in its extremest and most abhorrent features—indulged in by a candidate or by a man who was making a public canvass, and he was never molested. I was in the midst of the last election in Kentucky, and notwithstanding her Representatives, with one exception, are excluded from the House, and although I would have preferred different men myself, with another exception, and sought for the nomination of different men, I say that a more peaceful, legal, and fair election never took place.

Now, Mr. President, one word in relation to the treatment by the people of Kentucky of the negro race, slave and free. About one fifth of our population was negro, and about ten thousand of them free. From the beginning negroes were excluded from giving testimony in cases where white men were parties, and that upon this reason and this principle: that almost all of them belonged at the time this regulation was made to white men, and they could not be supposed to give their evidence unbiassed in cases in which their masters would be parties. This philosophic truth in relation to our nature excluded them; but when the negro was freed he had every right to acquire property that the white man had; he had every right to institute his suit that white men had; he had every right to institute a penal prosecution or a criminal prosecution for an outrage upon his rights that a white man had. He was not allowed to give evidence. But the suggestion of one of the orators at the Fourth of July meeting in Lexington will certainly prove true, that that disability will be removed at the next session of our Legislature. I have been consulted myself by various men who will be in the Legislature as to what ought to be done on that subject, and I have given them as my advice that it ought unhesitatingly to be done; and they will be placed on the same basis in relation to testimony in courts that white people are.

Mr. President, I have seen hundreds of negroes suing for their rights in our courts, slave and free. I have been the counsel of many of them. None has ever been so poor, so degraded, so penniless as not to be able to command my services and the services of any lawyer of that State, and those services were rendered to them with as much zeal and fidelity as though they had had countless thousands of gold to compensate for them. There never went a negro into a Kentucky court who had law and right upon his side that did not have the sympathies of the entire presence of people there, except his opponent and the lawyers of his opponent. The people of Kentucky are a brave, gallant people. They sympathize with the weak; they are magnanimous to the weak. They uphold those that are falling; they defend the weak and the powerless. It is only the vicious, the wicked, the base, the cowardly that want this characteristic of magnanimity. It may be wanting in Massachusetts, but it is not in Kentucky. Courage and magnanimity are the proudest characteristics of Kentucky.

Mr. President, we see the fell purpose of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. We know with what persistence he pursues his objects, it makes no odds what is the character of those objects, and we know that he intends to press this work of reconstruction. Well, let him press it. We will defend as best we may. We will appeal to the Constitution, to the reason, the judgment, the patriotism of Congress, to the highest courts of our country, to the bar of the American people and of American opinion to stay such an outrage upon their fundamental law and upon the rights of one of the truest members—according to the spirit of the Constitution—of the Union; and I have no doubt that this reference will discomfit the honorable Senator, though it may pain his heart.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will allow me to send up to the Chair a notice in formal shape, which I gave a short time ago.

Mr. POMEROY. I merely want to give notice that on Monday I shall ask for the consideration of House bill No. 108, for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. And to that end I shall ask for a repeal or for a suspension of so much of our rule as interferes with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a notice to that effect with regard to the bill to which I called attention. I wish to have it recorded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will be entered. The Chair will remind the Senate, however, that there is a bill before the body.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay the bill before the Senate on the table, with a view of taking up the House bill upon the same subject.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 130) supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States. House bill No. 130 was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

House joint resolution No. 71 was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I propose that we now adjourn, but I first move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that joint resolution comes within the rule of the Senate I object to its consideration, and if the motion of the Senator to lay it on the table be such action as will be regarded as a waiver of the objection I shall urge it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is any objection it will not be waived by laying the bill on the table. It will be regarded as laid on the table if there be no objection.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 135) to provide for the permanent location of all the Indian tribes west of the Missouri river and east of the Rocky mountains upon two reservations; which was read and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 13, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts relating to the Northern Pacific railroad; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CAPE COD HARBOR.

Mr. DAWES also, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts concerning Cape Cod harbor, at Provincetown; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

KENTUCKY ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. DAWES also presented testimony in the contested-election case from Kentucky, of J. E. Smith vs. John Young Brown; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

REBEL TREATMENT OF PRISONERS, ETC.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the treatment of prisoners of war and Union citizens by the so-called confederate Government are hereby authorized to sit at such place and take testimony by such number of the committee as they shall deem proper.

EXTENSION OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to extend the provisions of the homestead law to any public lands within the limits of any railroad land grant in any State or Territory of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands when appointed.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee of nine members, to be known as the Committee on Education, be appointed as the other standing committees are appointed, to which shall be referred all such matters as pertain to the educational interests of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on the Rules.

TREATMENT OF REBEL PRISONERS, ETC.

Mr. MUNGEN. I wish to make an inquiry in reference to a resolution offered by myself a day or two ago—a resolution in reference to the same subject as the resolution offered a few moments ago by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE.] I wish to know whether my resolution is still pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refers, as the Chair understands, to a resolution extending the investigation of the select Committee on Union Prisoners.

Mr. MUNGEN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made to the introduction of the resolution, and it was not received.

Mr. MUNGEN. I wish to say that the purpose of that resolution was evidently misunderstood by the gentleman who objected; and I desire again to ask consent to offer that resolution and to make a few remarks in explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Ohio explaining briefly a resolution which he asks unanimous consent to offer?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNGEN. The resolution which I propose to offer is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire into the treatment of prisoners, &c., be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report upon the treatment, &c., of prisoners confined in the camps of the United States Government during the war; and also to inquire into and report upon facts connected with the cartel as to exchange of prisoners, and the action under the same by the officers of the United States; and the so-called confederate government, and why a speedy exchange of prisoners from time to time was not effected.

Mr. Speaker, I did not then, and I do not now, offer this resolution with any captious feeling. I say, sir, in regard to the treatment of the prisoners in the camps of the United States that the investigation will show that they were treated as well as they could be treated under the circumstances. I know, so far as my knowledge goes, that they had enough to eat. Now, the instructions under which the committee is now acting will necessarily involve an investigation into the complicity of the confederate government with the suffering of our soldiers in the southern prisons. The archives of the confederate government, so-called, will necessarily have to be investigated to a certain extent by this committee, and the correspondence in reference to the exchange of prisoners will also have to be looked into.

I say now, with all respect to the officers of the United States Government, there were rumors which reached us in the field, and which have been prevalent ever since the war, that there was blame attached to some of the officers of the United States Army in regard to the exchange of prisoners. There were and there are rumors of that kind. If they are true we ought to know it; and if not true that fact should be made evident, and those who have been charged with blame should be inculpated. If they are guilty—I do not care who they may be—whoever is responsible for the death of our soldiers ought to be made known. That is the reason why I offer this resolution, and not for any partisan purpose.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. I object to the resolution.

Mr. MUNGEN. I move to suspend the rules?

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say a few words in regard to that resolution, if the House will allow me.

Mr. Speaker, on the previous day when this resolution was introduced it struck me as an insinuation and a reflection upon the generals who commanded our armies and upon the loyal people of the North; and for one I would distinctly oppose by my vote any action of mine upon this floor to leave the inference to be drawn that the prisoners in our hands during that terrible fight were treated without charity or in any other than a proper manner.

Mr. MUNGEN. I have disclaimed any such intention.

Mr. JUDD. Who, sir, of the North to-day, who of the loyal men in the North, demands that investigation should be made? Is there any belief among our friends that there was any such wrong that this Congress should solemnly resolve to investigate acts in reference to which in the loyal North there is no complaint? I say, Mr. Speaker, and I regret, it is a reflection upon the loyal people of the country who had those confederate prisoners in charge if this House should entertain for a moment, even by implication, the assertion that wrong was done to those prisoners. I am further of the opinion, sir, as to the propriety of the exchange of prisoners, and as to whether it was well conducted, that all those matters have been thoroughly investigated by the Committee on the Conduct of the War.

At any rate, I am not prepared or desirous of affording my honorable friend from Ohio opportunity to pick a hole in anybody's coat; and that is the object of the resolution, as I understand it. It is to get up a controversy as to the persons responsible for delay, if there was any, in the exchange of prisoners, and I hope that the loyal members of the House will not agree to any such investigation.

Mr. MUNGEN. Suppose it were true that an officer of this Government standing at the head of the exchange of prisoners made a remark in regard to the prisoners taken by our troops that we should not exchange these healthy, well-fed men for skeletons, thus leaving thousands of our soldiers to die of starvation, would the gentleman from Illinois be unwilling to have the matter investigated?

Mr. JUDD. In reply to the gentleman's interrogatory, I will say that it shows that this investigation, if not intended, will be used for partisan purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Having been a commissioner of exchange, I wish the House to allow me to say a word.

Mr. MUNGEN. I had no intention of referring specially to the gentleman or any other person.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to say, having been during the last year of the war, during the campaign of 1864, in charge of the exchange of prisoners on behalf of the United States Government, that for one and for all that had anything to do with it, we not only are ready, but we court any investigation into any action taken by the Exchange Bureau on this subject of the treatment of prisoners. I do not indicate and do not mean to indicate what shall be the action of the House upon this question. I only wish to say for myself and my associates, lest there should be any mistaken impression here or lest any mistaken impression should go forth to the country, that we are ready and willing that every act shall be subject to the most full and complete investigation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to inquire if the resolution is offered as an amendment to the resolution that passed the other day, or as an independent resolution?

The SPEAKER. An independent resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the motion is to suspend the rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to say a word or two on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I simply say that if we refuse the investigation called for by this resolution we thereby cast a greater reflection upon honest Union generals who had charge of this business than we possibly could by adopting it. If there is any reason why the investigation should be had, then let us have it, and if, as I hope the case is, all our generals who had anything to do with the treatment and exchange of rebel prisoners did as they ought to have done, the matter will stand out in brighter contrast when laid side by side with the action of the rebel authorities in their treatment of Union prisoners.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has ever heard an accusation made against the authorities of the United States of maltreatment of prisoners on our part; and further, if he has ever heard of any such accusation coming from any leading rebels?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot see what difference it makes, so far as the action of this House is concerned, whether I have or have not heard such accusations. I have had no communications from rebels one way or the other since the commencement of hostilities. But I say that I have read in some of the rebel papers charges of cruelty on our part toward their soldiers while in our hands, although, for one, I will say that I do not believe the charges were true. They were to this effect: that rebel prisoners confined in Camp Douglas, in Chicago, were not properly fed and clothed; were left to suffer from the inclemency of a northern winter, and that many of their men were frozen to death.

* Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to reply to the question put by his colleague?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The question was, as I understand it, whether any charge was made against any of our officers in regard to the exchange of prisoners which implicated them in the consequences that followed the non-exchange of prisoners; and whether any prominent rebel officers had made any such charge.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the question I asked.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The House granted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] the privilege to make a brief statement.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] repeat his question?

Mr. LOGAN. I asked if my colleague had ever heard charges made against the authorities of the United States of maltreatment of rebel prisoners; and further, if he had ever heard such charges made by leading rebel officers, and I will add, leading authorities of the rebel government.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That was a little different from what I understood it. But upon the other charge which the resolution is intended to cover I can say this: that I had a conversation with General Ould, in which he declared that he offered to the officers of the United States having in charge the subject of exchange of prisoners to give them twenty thousand United States prisoners confined in the South without equivalent, finding themselves unable to feed and take care of them as they ought to be. He made that offer distinctly to the generals in authority; and if I am not mistaken General Butler and General Grant were referred to; I am not certain of that, however. And the question was put by me: suppose you have not got twenty thousand sick and wounded men? Then, he said, we will make up the number with well men and give you twenty thousand men or all you will take off our hands, because we are unable to feed them or furnish them with the necessary medical supplies.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not pressing for an investigation of this subject, nor do I expect to throw any particular light on the details which may be involved in this question. I know nothing about them personally. I do not know that any Union officer who was connected with this matter of exchange failed to do his whole duty in regard to the exchange of prisoners. I do not know that there was one instance of tyranny or cruelty on the part of Union officers toward confederate prisoners. I hope that if an examination shall be had it will be made to appear that all Union officers acted with a sense of humanity and the rights of prisoners under the laws of war.

No man will say that it is because I have any sympathy with rebels as such that I favor the investigation proposed. But, sir, when I remember that our party have had the control of this war and of all questions connected with it, civil, military, and political, during the last four years, it seems to me that we ought not to object to an investigation as to the treatment of the rebel prisoners who were in our hands. I have no objection that the whole question shall be examined. I do not wish to refer the question as to the conduct of one particular general in reference to this matter to the committee. I would rather have a general investigation.

Mr. LOGAN. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LOGAN. I would suggest to my colleague that if he, or any other gentleman desires to investigate the conduct of any individual officer it would be better for him to name him in the resolution, and of course the House will adopt that resolution. But the resolution offered here is offered as an express rebuttal to a resolution offered in reference to the treatment of rebel prisoners.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not a question.

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to put it in the form of a question. I would ask if it would not be better that my colleague should so frame his resolution that it shall charge some persons, some particular Army officer, with some particular act of wrong that has been perpetrated, and allow that to be investigated, without bringing up a kind of general rebuttal, the design of which is to leave an impression on the mind of the community that wrong has been done where no wrong has ever been done?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I must now resume the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The House has by unanimous consent granted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] permission to make a brief statement. It is for the House to determine whether that statement has been too much enlarged.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is objection to a general discussion about this matter.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will raise that point of order the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] objects to my proceeding with my remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has yielded a large portion of his time to his colleague [Mr. LOGAN] and to others, it seems to me that it would be unfair to cut him off now.

Mr. DAWES. Then, sir, I will withdraw the objection I raised for a brief moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I will put my question in this form: while there is no doubt throughout the country as to the humane treatment of rebel prisoners, would it not be as well to investigate the question as to whether Christ was crucified on Mount Calvary as to investigate a fact in reference to which there is no doubt in any part of the country?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no doubt whatever upon the question of the crucifixion which the gentleman raises. If he is doubtful about it let him offer a proposition for an investigating committee, if he desires it.

Now, sir, my colleague assumes that this is my resolution, or that I desire some investigation in regard to our treatment of prisoners. The resolution had not its origin with me. If I understand the matter, it arose in this way: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] introduced a resolution proposing an investigation in regard to the treatment of our prisoners by the rebels. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MUNCY] now seeks to offer this resolution, proposing to refer to the same committee the other branch of the subject—the treatment of rebel prisoners in our hands. Now, sir, the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of this committee, is a Union man, and the majority of this committee are also Union men—friends of the Union Army and the Union party. What objection can there be, when a Democratic member of the House proposes to direct an investigation by this committee of a subject germane to that already referred to them? There seems to be some apprehension here that some particular officer of the Union Army who had connection with the exchange of prisoners will be damaged by this investigation.

Now, sir, it is not my object to damage any one; nor do I desire to promote the interests of any particular individual. I wish simply to have the truth; and I believe that a fair, full, and free investigation of this subject will reflect nothing but credit upon the officers of the Union Army and upon the Union party that prosecuted the war. I believe this investigation will show that we treated the rebel prisoners with humanity and considerate kindness. Will the gentlemen who had charge of the exchange of prisoners be damaged by an investigation of this kind, conducted by a committee of our own friends?

When we have control of this whole subject, when we have a committee of our own friends, is it magnanimous for us, while we order an investigation of this question so far as the conduct of the rebels is concerned, to forbid that the same committee—a committee of our own friends—shall investigate the treatment of rebel prisoners while in our hands? I say it is not magnanimous; it is not fair; and it will do us as a party no good to smother a resolution of this kind.

One word further. My colleague assumes that this resolution of the gentleman from Ohio is sought to be introduced for no other purpose than as a sort of rejoinder, rebutter, or offset to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana. I submit, sir, that we have no right to assume any such thing. If my colleague has any information on that subject he has more information than I have. All I know is that a gentleman, exercising his right as a Representative on this floor, has risen in his place and proposed this resolution. He has not, as he might have done, asked for the appointment of an independent committee, of which, if it had been appointed, he would by courtesy have been the chairman. He is content (which seems to me fair and reasonable) that the committee appointed under the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana shall investigate the whole subject.

Mr. DAVES. I rise to a point of order. I think the gentleman from Illinois has made himself perfectly understood, and I raise the point of order that the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must sustain the point of order, as consent was asked, not to speak for an hour, but to make a brief statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have but a word further to say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVES] insists on the point of order, and the Chair must rule that the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to speak upon this subject for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me one word?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, I will allow the gentleman one word.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand the gentleman has only four minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has certainly made a very strong point against his own friends. It seems to me eminently proper and just that this investigation should be extended. I wish to say to the House, without making any charge against any general of the Army or against any officer of any kind whatever, that there is in the minds of the people some doubt as to whether that course was pursued which ought to have been with reference to exchange of prisoners with the so-called confederate States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLER] in the speeches which he made all over the country, or at least in many places in the country, charged that General Grant was responsible for or was the cause of the exchanges not having been made.

Mr. BUTLER, (in his seat.) Never.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was claimed at the time the confederate States were unable to feed and take care of or to furnish the necessary medical and other supplies to the prisoners, and that the person at that time having the matter in charge on behalf of the so-called confederate States offered to deliver twenty thousand of our soldiers held as prisoners without any equivalents on our part whatever. It is so charged. I do not say that it is true, but I had the statement myself from General Ould. I also understand that our general or officer having the matter in charge either declined to make any exchange or made no reply to the proposition. General Ould was not so much surprised, he said, at not receiving an answer from General Grant, because General Grant knew at the time that the confederacy was a mere shell and that it was only a question of time when it must fall to pieces. General Ould stated that he made that offer to the officer of the United States having the matter in charge several months before the confederacy fell through; that they would give us twenty thousand sick and wounded men, and if they had not that number of sick and wounded men he would make the number up to twenty thousand of able-bodied prisoners; and that he made the offer in the interest of humanity. Whether this is true or not I do not know. I should like to know exactly how the matter stands. This is the subject the resolution proposes to investigate. What can be the objection? The people want to know the truth of these charges. I tell you, sir, that the majority of this House dare not refuse to permit this subject to be investigated. Your constituency when you go home will not justify you for refusing to order such an investigation. If the generals or officers having the subject in charge are free from blame they will go unscathed. If they are guilty it ought to be known, and the guilt rest where it belongs. The guilty alone will object to the investigation; the innocent cannot be injured by it. It is a matter of justice to both—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PILE. I ask to speak two minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object to any further debate on this subject.

Mr. PILE. I would like to make a statement.

Mr. BROMWELL. I also wish to make a suggestion to the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish unanimous consent of the House to reply to what I understand to be the charge in relation to this matter. I do not want more than five minutes.

Mr. BOYER. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be allowed five minutes.

The resolution was again read.

The House divided on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 38, noes 75.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask to make a personal explanation.

Mr. BOYER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to enter into this matter of exchange in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] I wish to premise in the first place that in 1864, at the December session of this House, all the correspondence on the subject of exchange of prisoners was called for by the House from the Secretary of War, and was furnished on the 6th day of January, 1865, and is upon the records of this House and can be referred to by gentlemen. Every letter, every telegram received or sent by the commissioner on the part of the United States or on the part of the rebel government is upon your files; so that every written document is before us now.

Now as regards the specific charge of the gentleman from Wisconsin—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I did not make any charge. I only stated the information I received and the source of it.

Mr. BUTLER. In regard to the information given by the commissioner of exchange on the part of the rebels to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I think a slight statement will acquit everybody of any blame. In the fall of 1864, after the exchange had been stopped, a proposition was made on the part of the rebel authorities to give us the sick men that they had in Savannah and Millen, Georgia, as soon as transportation could be got. That proposition was accepted.

More than that: the commissioner of exchange on the part of the United States offered to allow them to send cotton to the North and sell it in the market of New York for the purpose of supplying themselves with the necessary provisions and clothing for our prisoners in their hands.

More than that: we offered to send anything that they would take, and as soon as sea transportation necessary for that purpose could be procured by the commissioner of exchange from the quartermaster's department six boats, capable of taking over seven thousand men, were sent down to Savannah, and the sick Union prisoners in the hands of the rebels were delivered over to us and brought here as fast as they could be by all the transportation that could be obtained. There was some delay in regard to getting the transportation because of the necessary movements of the Army, as I am informed by the Quartermaster General. But the correspondence on your files will show the proposition on the one side that we made and the acceptance on the other, and then a counter offer, when it was said they had not the means of taking care of the Union prisoners in their hands, that they might send to their own select agent in New York city—and they had enough who sympathized sufficiently with them to do it—cotton or other produce, and sell it at the then high price, for the purpose of feeding, clothing, and administering medicine to the Union prisoners in the hands of the rebels.

That is the exact state of facts, and these facts will come out upon investigation. And I say again, if the gentleman will turn to the files of this House of January, 1865, he will find every word that I have stated in the written propositions and acceptances on one side and on the other, which have never yet been printed and sent to the country, to my knowledge. If the gentleman wants to pursue this subject, the first thing that had better be done is to have that correspondence printed and sent to the country. Everybody will then understand exactly what was done and what was not done up to within three months of the surrender of General Lee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wanted to make an inquiry of the gentleman; I hope the House will allow me to do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

PETITION FROM ARKANSAS.

The House resumed the consideration of the question pending at the adjournment last evening, being a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving a petition from the Legislature of Arkansas in relation to the levees of the Mississippi river, on which Mr. MORGAN was entitled to the floor for twenty-three minutes, the remainder of his hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to offer a resolution? I will say to my colleague [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that whenever he or anybody will make a distinct and definite charge we are ready for an investigation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will my colleague allow me to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe I did not occupy but about three minutes of the thirty-seven which I find charged to me, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] having occupied thirty-four minutes. It would afford me great pleasure to yield now to the gentleman were not the time which I propose to occupy upon this subject so very brief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to twenty-three minutes. He may yield by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask to be allowed to offer a resolution for information.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield for that.

The Clerk read the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas irresponsible statements have been made by persons in sympathy with the late rebellion implying that the Government of the United States has inhumanly treated its prisoners during the late rebellion; and whereas no evidence has been produced to show that such allegations have any foundation in fact; and whereas the loyal people of the United States are well satisfied that in no instance were its prisoners treated otherwise than with kindness and humanity; Therefore,

Resolved, That this House will entertain no resolution which implies other than the most kind, tender, and humane treatment of its prisoners, unless such resolution is accompanied by a responsible charge that they were treated otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to a resolution of that character.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] must either proceed with his remarks or surrender the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I arose in my place last evening, Mr. Speaker, to present a petition from the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, without anticipating that it would involve any opposition or lead to any debate. I supposed that in this Hall the right of petition was sacred; a right guaranteed by the Constitution; a right which no free Government or free assembly would deny; and I am unwilling to believe, sir, that honorable gentlemen in this House will deny the right of the people of Arkansas to be heard by petition to the constituted authorities of the country.

I understand the objection made by the honorable gentleman to the reception of this petition to be that the State of Arkansas is not a State of the Union. Now, sir, with great deference to the opinion of the honorable gentleman who made that point, I would say that I know of but two methods by which a State once in the Union can get without its limits. It could only be done by the unanimous consent of the States of the Union or by force of arms.

It is not claimed, I think, by any gentleman upon this floor that the State of Arkansas obtained the consent of all the other States of the Union to withdraw from this Confederation; nor will it be claimed that the State of Arkansas succeeded in getting out of the Union by force of arms. It is true that on the 6th day of May, 1861, an illegal and revolutionary body in the State of Arkansas did pass what was termed an ordinance of secession, the design of which was to take Arkansas out of the Union. If that ordinance did take that State out of the Union then Arkansas had the right to secede. But if it did not withdraw Arkansas from the Union, then that ordinance was null and void.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will pardon me, without any discourtesy to him, I must decline now to give way.

It will not be denied that on the 5th day of May, 1861, the State of Arkansas was within the Union. If on the 6th day of May, within twenty-four hours afterward, she was out of the Union, it must have been by force of the ordinance of secession, and if so she had the right to secede, which I deny.

If, then, the State of Arkansas had no right to secede from the Union, and failed to go out by force of arms, she is as much in the Union as she was before the first hostile gun was fired at Fort Sumter. Not only this, but the Federal Government in all its coordinate branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, has recognized that all of the so-called seceding States are and have been States in the Union during the entire time of the war. I believe that President Lincoln during his term of office never issued a single proclamation in which he did not distinctly speak of these States as States of the Union.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that these States were States of the Union, and this House have time and again by almost unanimous vote recognized the fact by their acts that the insurrectionary States are States of the Union. It is true that an insurrection arose in these States, but it is also true that it was not only the right but the duty of the Federal Government to put down that insurrection, and if necessary by force of arms. The insurrection was suppressed, and now these States occupy the same position under the Constitution as they did prior to the war.

Why, sir, in 1862 the President of the United States, acting through the Secretary of War, issued letters appointing provisional governors for all the States that were in rebellion. The appointment of the provisional governor of North Carolina was in the following terms:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., May 19, 1862.

SIR: You are hereby appointed military governor of the State of North Carolina, with authority to exercise and perform within the limits of that State all and singular the powers, duties, and functions pertaining to the office of military governor (including the power to establish all necessary offices and tribunals, and suspend the writ of habeas corpus) during the pleasure of the President, or until the loyal inhabitants of that State shall organize a civil government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

And President Lincoln, following out his plan of reorganizing the southern States as States within the Union, declared in his amnesty proclamation:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that whenever in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Virginia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid, and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion.'"

Now, sir, under this proclamation of President Lincoln, the State of Arkansas did reorganize her State government, and it was recognized as such by him as President of the United States.

In his proclamation of July 8, 1864, Mr. Lincoln said:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known that while I am (as I was in December last when by proclamation I propounded a plan of restoration) unprepared, by formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and while I am also unprepared to declare that the free State constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort," &c.

It was, sir, but the other day that this House in conjunction with the Senate of the United States appropriated one million or a million and a half dollars from the national Treasury—for what purpose? To give relief to the starving people of the South. Now, sir, this petition which the honorable gentlemen seek to reject—this prayer of the loyal people of Arkansas—people as loyal as any of the honorable and distinguished gentlemen who object to the reception of this memorial—comes from a government constituted and formed by the loyal people of Arkansas nearly one year before the capitulation of Lee and Johnston. This government was then formed, not by the rebellious people of Arkansas, but by loyal citizens of that State, who were then, are now, and always have been devoted to the Constitution of the United States.

What does this petition ask? It asks an appropriation of $2,500,000 that the lands of Arkansas and Louisiana may be protected from the devastation caused by the overflowing of the Mississippi river. It states that three hundred thousand acres of the most valuable land in the State of Arkansas cannot now be put under cultivation for the want of sufficient levees, and that one half of this land is capable of producing four hundred pounds of cotton to the acre; and that the tax imposed upon that cotton would yield to the Government an annual revenue of $1,800,000. Now, I ask whether it would not be wise and patriotic for Congress to grant to those people the means of returning to the pursuits of agricultural industry, to enable them once more to put their fields under cultivation, to develop their resources, instead of compelling them to come before the national Legislature to ask for alms.

Sir, I know something of the people of that State, and there are other gentlemen on this floor who were acquainted with them during the war and prior thereto, and who entertain the same opinion of them that I do. I declare here that during the late contest, from the time the first gun was fired to the last, the majority of the people of Arkansas were with the Union. I know that when the army of the Southwest advanced to take Fort Hindman the people all along the Arkansas river greeted them with cheers and with the waving of handkerchiefs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask whether it is wise for a great, triumphant, and powerful people to act toward this State of Arkansas as the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Illinois would have us do in refusing to receive this petition? Is there not an attempt, Mr. Speaker, to place loyalists and disloyalists under the same iron rule? And if we continue to treat the Union men of the South with injustice and contempt may we not inspire in their hearts a hatred more intense and inveterate than that which ever animated secession soldier or secession politician? I trust, sir, that gentlemen will rise superior to partisan considerations, and act in a spirit of humanity and justice, if not with generosity and magnanimity.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there be any time remaining to the gentleman from Ohio I should like to make an explanation of my action.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. There are only four minutes left.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I raised the question on the reception of the petition purporting to come from the Legislature of the State of Arkansas solely for the purpose of bringing before the House the question whether the Legislature of Arkansas is a constitutional body representing a State of this Union, and whether we should recognize it as existing by the reception of a petition from that body to the Congress of the United States. I want to disclaim here any hostility whatever to the objects mentioned in the petition. I would be glad to see Congress do whatever it can rightly do toward repressing, if you please, the mighty Mississippi in its ravages in the southern and southwestern States. I should like to see the improvement of that river undertaken by Congress so far as it can be, or at least I should like to see Congress give such guarantees to the people of those territories as will enable them to make the necessary improvements of that river. If the United States would guaranty the undertaking the improvement would be made speedily; and it would not only result in the local prosperity of the people down there, but, sir, it would result in the general prosperity of the whole country. I therefore desire to disclaim any hostility to the object of the petition. My only object in making the motion was to see whether we would, as the House of Representatives, recognize the Legislature of the State of Arkansas as having a constitutional existence.

Mr. MORGAN. I now demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54; noes 87.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not think gentlemen on the other side were afraid to face the record.

The petition was then received, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed.

RELIEF OF NAVAJO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the relief of the Navajo Indians at or near Fort Sumner, New Mexico; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FRAUDS ON REVENUE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 9th instant, a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to the frauds on the internal revenue in the fifth district of North Carolina; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ALMANSON EATON.

On motion of Mr. COBB, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Almanson Eaton, of Stevens's Point, Wisconsin.

DEDICATION OF ANTIETAM CEMETERY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter of invitation from the managers of the Antietam cemetery:

184 EAST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, July 8, 1867.

Sir: A committee of arrangements appointed by the board of management of the Antietam National Cemetery have fixed upon the 17th day of July, 1867, the anniversary of the battle from which it derives its name, for the dedication of the same, and constitute the undersigned a special committee to secure the attendance of yourself and the members and other officers of the body over which you preside. In fulfilling this pleasant duty, in consideration of the favorable influence upon others, which an early assurance of your compliance with this invitation would not fail to have, and in grateful remembrance of what Congress have already done for the sepulture of the nation's heroic dead, we shall await your acceptance of it, with no little concern, giving, as it would, proof of the continuance of your sympathy in the patriotic work committed, in part, to the board which we represent, by States having dead on the field of Antietam.

Asking that you will lay this communication before the House of Representatives at your earliest convenience, we beg to subscribe ourselves,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. E. SNODGRASS,
THOMAS A. BOULLT,
G. L. CRANMER,

Special Committee of Invitation.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

TREATMENT OF REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I now ask consent to offer the following:

Whereas irresponsible statements have been made by persons in sympathy with the late rebellion, implying that the Government of the United States has inhumanly treated its prisoners during the late rebellion; and whereas no evidence has been produced to show that such allegations have any foundation in fact, and no responsible person has yet made any such charge; and whereas the loyal people of the United States are well satisfied that in no instance were its prisoners treated otherwise than with kindness and humanity: Therefore,

Resolved, That this House will entertain no resolution which implies other than the most kind, tender, and humane treatment of its prisoners, unless such resolution is accompanied by a responsible charge that they were treated otherwise.

Mr. BURE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move to suspend the rules.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 82, noes 19.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I desire simply to say that the resolution is inaccurate in one respect. The New York Tribune has distinctly stated that these charges have existed, and that the matter should be investigated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I do not yield for discussion.

Mr. GETZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have declined to yield to several gentlemen on this side.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the preamble and resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a separate vote on the preamble.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 20, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broome, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullum, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eila, Ferriss, Ferry, Finney, Gravely, Griswold, Halscy, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketchum, Koonce, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsey, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeld, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Townbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Haight, Richard D. Hubbard, Marshall, Munger, Niblack, Robinson, Ross, Sigreaves, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—20.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barnum, Blaine, Brooks, Butler, Cake, Coburn, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fields, Garrison, Glossbrenner, Harding, Hill, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Kerr, Kitchen, Ladin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCaithy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Van Aernam, and Van Wyck—42.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MORGAN stated that he had paired off with one of his colleagues, who was under the necessity of going home.

The question recurred on the adoption of the preamble, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the supplemental reconstruction bill. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 123, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first amendment of the House, with the following amendments: in line ten strike out the word "illegal" and in lieu thereof insert "not legal State governments;" line thirteen before the word "authority" insert the word "paramount;" and that the House agree to the same as amended.

That the House recede from its second amendment to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the second section of the Senate amendment, amended as follows: in line three strike out the word "approval" and insert "disapproval;" line four after the word "States" insert "and to have effect till disapproved;" line seven, strike out the word "approval" and insert "disapproval;" line seven, after the word "General" insert "as;" add at the end of the section "and to fill vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the third section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the fourth section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendments to the fifth section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendment to the sixth section of the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: strike out the word "time" in the ninth line and in lieu thereof insert "commencement;" line seventeen, strike out the words "the general laws" and in lieu thereof insert "any general law;" at the end of line seventeen add "or for the administration of justice;" and that the Senate agree to the same as amended.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the seventh section of the amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from its amendments in adding sections nine, ten, and eleven, being House amendments eight, nine, and ten.

That the Senate agree to the House amendment eleven, numbered section twelve, with the following amendments: strike out the word "holding" after the word "persons" in line two, and in lieu thereof insert the words "hereafter elected or appointed to;" insert the words "any so-called" before the word "State" in line three; and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the twelfth amendment of the House, numbered section thirteen, with the following amendment: insert the word "civil" before the word "officer" in the fifth line, and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to the thirteenth amendment of the House, amended as follows: in line one strike out "fourteen" and insert "eleven."

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

GEORGE S. EDMUNDS,

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THADDEUS STEVENS,

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

W. S. HOLMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask that the fifth section of the bill as agreed to by the committee of conference be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be read, but the matter before the House is the report of the committee of conference as a whole. It will perhaps be easier for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Let it be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to my colleague that he allow the bill to be read by sections, as it is proposed to amend it.

The SPEAKER. It will probably take some length of time for the Clerk to read it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the reading, but I think I can explain in a few words the essential amendments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The committee of conference recommend that the House recede from its amendments to the fifth section, and therefore if the two Houses agree to the report of the committee the fifth section will stand precisely as it came from the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, most of the amendments made by the House have been agreed to with some slight amendments. One of these is, I think, quite an improvement. Where the House bill originally spoke of the authority of Congress over this whole subject we have so modified it as to speak of "the paramount authority of Congress," which put the matter in a position which I think decidedly preferable.

The principal provisions of our bill have been retained, except two. One is the section offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in relation to penalties, which the members of the committee representing the Senate said that the Senate could not agree to on account of some reasons which that body deems sufficient. We did not think it worth while to split upon that. The other provision is one which I had more at heart—that district commanders should not be removed without the consent of the Senate. Upon this question we were about to split, having agreed upon everything else. After the Senate had finally consented to concede the "paramount authority of Congress" over this subject, I could not see the logic of their reasoning in contending that we have no constitutional power to say that these officers shall not be removed without the consent of the Senate. But I beg the House to consider that the Senate is several furlongs behind the House in the march of reform—perhaps I ought to say of radicalism. They are coming up sidelong; they have not got square up. I have already illustrated this in stating the fact that while they conceded in one part of the bill the "paramount authority of Congress," they still doubted whether the Constitution did not control the subject in a particular way.

This seems to me very strange; and I can account for it only by supposing in traveling South they see the ghost of the Constitution "as it was," and forget that the part which covered the dominion of the so-called Confederate States of America had been consumed in the fierce conflict and wholly repudiated by a belligerent acknowledged to be independent, (as a belligerent,) and thus their action is obstructed. This is natural enough. I do not find any fault in regard to the matter. I am only apologizing for the Senate and stating the reason why I thought it right for us to yield rather than to press them under these peculiar circumstances.

As I said before, I would decidedly have preferred that the section in relation to penalties should have been retained; but the Senate considered it unnecessary on the ground that existing laws provided for all that. I did not feel disposed to quarrel with them upon that point. Generally, as I have already remarked, the points in which this bill differs from the original House bill appear to me improvements. If any gentleman wishes to ask me any question in reference to any particular point I shall be happy to answer him. If not, I will yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who desires to explain briefly his reasons for signing this report, which is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the provision of the bill as to requiring the removal from office of disloyal persons and those who obstruct the execution of the law on this subject in the southern States.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That is just as we sent it to the Senate. We took care that it should be retained. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was opposed to the original bill of the House, as well as to the amendment of the Senate, and the various amendments made by the House to the Senate amendment, indeed to this entire measure; but taking in view alone the question of adjustment of the matters in difference between the two Houses, and without concurring in most of the propositions upon which the committee have agreed, I have signed the report as the best adjustment that could be made of the points of difference between the two Houses, regarding the conclusions reached as preferable to the propositions adopted by either House. In this view I have concurred in the report, and not as giving my approval to this measure of legislation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 22, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Coyode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Liell, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Platts, Poland, Polesky, Price, Ramm, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Arman, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnes, Boyer, Burr, Chandler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Haight, Holman, Richard D. Hubbard, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Taber, Van Anken, Van Trump, and Wood—22.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Barnum, Blaine, Brooks, Cake, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Harding, Hooper, Hochkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kerr, Kitchin, Ladin, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrill, Morrissey, Nicholson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Van Wyck, and John T. Wilson—36.

So the report was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. MORGAN stated that if he had not been paired off he would have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a proposition which I think will challenge the cordial approval of every member of the House, whatever his political relations may be. I find that the cause of the great delay in the payment of the additional bounty under the act of 1866 is that the muster-out rolls are deposited in the office of the Second Auditor. It becomes necessary, therefore, in every case to make application to the Second Auditor for information. I understand that there are ninety thousand applications in that office now unanswered, and that it is impossible to carry on these cases any faster than ten thousand a month. I offer a resolution, which I present at the suggestion of one of the officers of the pay department, drawn up substantially at that department, and which, if adopted, will relieve the soldiers of the difficulty and delay in being paid their bounties. I ask that the resolution be read, and if there be any objection I shall move to suspend the rules. It is a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause certain muster-out rolls to be photographed.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that, in order to facilitate the payment of bounty to soldiers of the United States under the act of July 28, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to have photographic copies of the muster-out rolls of all organizations employed during the war of the rebellion the members of which are entitled to bounty; and that duplicate copies shall be furnished to the Paymaster General, one to be retained by him, and one to be used in the Division of Referred Claims.

It also provides that the expenses attending the photographing of said rolls shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. PILE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that we ought to provide against the multiplication of copies of these rolls, as I understand the negative from which they will be printed is upon glass, and there ought to be some provision made in regard to the security of that negative.

Mr. PAINE. I will accept any proper amendment which the gentleman will prepare. I wish to add that as the law now stands, I am informed it will be impossible to pay these bounties within four years.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the inability to copy these rolls fast enough is the special cause of the delay in the payment of the bounties. The country ought to know what is the cause of the delay, and I wish to know if, in his inquiry at the Department, he has found that to be the main cause. If so, it seems to me a very trivial one. The resolution is to some extent a remedy of the evil; but I do not see why the labor of copying papers of this kind should cause all the delay complained of.

Mr. PAINE. I am informed and believe that it is. The delay in examining these rolls is the precise difficulty which stands in the way of the speedy payment of the bounties, and this resolution is intended to afford prompt relief.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to know why this resolution is necessary. Is it because the Department has no authority at all to do this, or is it because it is easier and cheaper to photograph than to copy in the ordinary way? It seems to me that they can put clerks to copying many different rolls at once: and if they have not sufficient force, all they want is the authority to employ additional clerks. Certainly if there are so many rolls as are stated there can be many more clerks employed; and I suppose a copy in manuscript is just as good for all practical purposes as a copy by photograph. I wish to know whether they have delayed the soldiers all this time because they have had not sufficient force or no authority to put the clerks at work copying the rolls.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire, with the permission of my friend, to move to amend the last section of the joint resolution by substituting therefor the following:

That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay the expenses of the execution of this act.

I believe by a rule of this House it is necessary to limit the appropriation.

Mr. PAINE. I accept the amendment, and now demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope this resolution will not be put on its passage until there is some security provided against the multiplication of these copies by photography. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] is now preparing an amendment for that purpose. In the mean time I wish to make another suggestion. There is cause of complaint, I think, actually existing in reference to the order in which these applications for bounty are taken up. I do not aver it of my own knowledge; but I am in possession of proof, which, I think, I shall make very distinct before long, that a system of favoritism has been pursued in the taking up out of their order cases where claims have been made for additional bounty as well as for the settlement of accounts by the officers of the different Departments. I would therefore like to have the gentleman accept an amendment which will make it a misdemeanor and provide some penalty where an officer shall practice favoritism of that sort. An application sometimes lies there years undisturbed of, as I am advised, while other applications are considered and acted upon which were subsequently filed. As to the reason suggested that they have not the rolls, I can only say this: that accounts and pay-rolls presented on the settlement of different accounts of different paymasters have been taken out of their order, and gross favoritism has been shown. There has been at least one claim agent who was afterward detected in the vilest frauds against the Government, who seems to have, in a good degree, the run of one of the Departments of this Government in bringing these claims forward and getting them acted upon. I will prepare an amendment to meet that case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me, I will inquire if he has any information as to the probable cost of photographing all these rolls?

Mr. PAINE. I have not.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Or as to the length of time that it will take to get them taken?

Mr. PAINE. I have no information on either of these points.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It seems to me, then, that it will be a little dangerous for us to enter upon legislation of that kind without knowing something as to whether in fact this resolution will facilitate the payment of these bounties in the least. And I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that as there is not the slightest probability of getting this joint resolution through the Senate at this session he consent to its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, so that that committee may investigate these points and we may not legislate in the dark. This is a new species of legislation which has not been practiced heretofore by the Government, and it seems to me that it would be a dangerous precedent for us to set at this time. I should much prefer that the matter should be investigated by a proper committee before we vote upon it.

Mr. MUGEN. I think that there is another difficulty in the way besides the lack of photographers in that Department. After the close of the last session of Congress I had occasion to go to the office of the Second Auditor, and I found there over three hundred mail bags full of applications which never had been opened. I asked the Chief Clerk what was the reason, and he replied that they had not sufficient clerical force; that they were driving this matter through as speedily as possible. I received this information from Mr. E. B. French, Chief Clerk in the Second Auditor's office.

Mr. COOK. During the last session of Congress my attention was called to the delay in the payment of bounties, and I introduced a resolution providing for an increase of the clerical force in the office of the Second Auditor. But on conversing with the Second Auditor on the subject I understood him to say that they had as many clerks then employed as could be employed to any advantage about the business of preparing these rolls. Consequently that resolution was suffered to fall. There is no doubt that the paymaster's office would have paid these bounties a good deal faster than they have done if they could have procured the necessary information from the office of the Second Auditor. And in examining the subject at the last session I could not see how an increase in the clerical force in the Second Auditor's office would accomplish the result which we desired.

While I am upon the floor I would like to state that very great irregularity has taken place in the payment of these bounties. I know that applications made have been suffered to remain in the office long after applications subsequently made have been paid, applications from members of the same company and the same regiment. I do not know what the reason is, but it seems to me to be very singular that claims should be paid in that irregular manner.

DUTY ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BARNES. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to yield to me, to allow me to ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. PAINE. I will yield to have the resolution read, but I have already yielded so long that after that I must insist upon the demand for the previous question.

The Clerk read Mr. BARNES's resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House the amount of money raised in the different collection districts of the United States from the manufacture of distilled spirits for the several fiscal years since 1862; and for the separate quarters of the last fiscal year so far as received, together with the tax per gallon levied upon said article during said period.

Mr. PILE. I object to the resolution.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] asks leave of absence after to-day.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary a joint resolution in relation to the right of franchise of citizens of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and whereas the duty thus enjoined is necessarily devolved upon the Congress of the United States, and carries with it the right to determine what is a republican form of government, which question, being a purely political one, belongs solely to the legislative department of the Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., as the deliberate judgment of this Congress, that the right to the elective franchise, unless forfeited by crime, is an absolutely necessary and fundamental principle of republican government, affording the true safeguard of the citizen against partial and unjust legislation, and essential to the national security and peace; and that the constitutions or laws of any States of this Union which deny to any of their citizens, being citizens of the United States, the right to vote on account of race or color, or which impose any conditions or qualifications for the exercise of the right not demanded of all other citizens, are repugnant to the form and spirit of republican government, at war with the Declaration of Independence, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and ought to be so amended as to conform thereto.

Several members objected.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at present, as the House is acting upon another subject under a suspension of the rules.

PAYMENT OF ADDITIONAL BOUNTIES—AGAIN.

Mr. PAINE. I wish now to have the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri read.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. PILE, as follows:

Add to the first resolution these words: "and that he shall cause the negative plates from which these copies are taken to be at once destroyed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Instead of making any remarks, I will simply propose the following as an additional resolution:

Be it further resolved, That in taking up and considering claims for additional bounty, such claims shall be acted on in the order in which they may be or have been severally presented or filed; and any officer or employé of the Government who shall be found guilty of authorizing, favoring, or filed in giving preference to the examination of and action on any such claim, to the exclusion of other like claims previously filed or presented, shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished, on conviction thereof, by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, and shall be dismissed from his office or employment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that his amendment, providing that claims shall be acted on in the order in which they are filed or presented, may cause in some cases a great deal of unnecessary delay. The pay department, as I understand, acts upon the claims filed as fast as the rolls are obtained from the Second Auditor's office. The pay department might have the roll containing the name of a claimant whose claim was filed only yesterday; while it might not have the roll containing the name of a claimant whose claim was filed six months ago.

Mr. PAINE. I now demand the previous question on the joint resolution and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] might have a different effect from that which he intends. Suppose that there should be a case in which the proof should be defective; would it not be necessary, under his amendment, that action on all claims subsequently filed should be deferred until that particular claim could be finally acted upon?

Mr. SCHENCK. If, on taking up any particular case, it should be discovered that the proof was defective, that claim must of course be laid aside. The object of my amendment is simply that claims shall be taken up in their order.

Mr. ROSS. I am satisfied that they would be required under the amendment to stop until that case was disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. If there is any doubt on that point I am willing to modify it in that respect. My object is to stimulate the disposal of this business. Insert the words "except in case of defect of proof."

Mr. HOLMAN. It also should say "or the suspension of any case."

Mr. SCHENCK. Insert "or from some other good cause."

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is it in order to move that this be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is not while the House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 36; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. PAINE and Mr. BENJAMIN.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 47.

The Speaker voted in the negative.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 18, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arphor, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Getz, Gravely, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Marshall, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starkweather, Thomas, Upson, Van Arnam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—91.

YAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Blair, Boutwell, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Ferriss, Haight, Hamilton, Judd, Moorhead, Noell, Taffe, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—13.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Bromwell, Brooks, Cake, Churchill, Cornell, Dodge, Eekley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Nicholson, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Van Auken, Van Wyck, and John T. Wilson—81.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and whereas the duty thus enjoined is necessarily devolved upon the Congress of the United States, and carries with it the right to determine what is a republican form of government, which question, being a purely political one, belongs solely to the legislative department of the Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., as the deliberate judgment of this Congress, That the right to the elective franchise, unless forfeited by crime, is an absolutely necessary and fundamental principle of republican government, affording the true safeguard of the citizen against partial and unjust legislation, and essential to the national security and peace; and that the constitutions or laws of any States of this Union which deny to any of their citizens, being citizens of the United States, the right to vote on account of race or color, or which impose any conditions or qualifications for the exercise of the right not demanded of all other citizens, are repugnant to the form and spirit of republican government, at war with the Declaration of Independence, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and ought to be so amended as to conform thereto.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand tellers on that motion.

Tellers were refused.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to—ayes 68, noes 20.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to suggest a form of expression in the title which is not well warranted. It is the expression "right of franchise," a very common expression, I admit, but nevertheless incorrect. The body of the resolution contains the words "right of the elective franchise," which is correct. Franchise is nothing more than right, and to say "right of franchise" is equivalent to saying "franchise of franchise."

Mr. JULIAN. The phrase was not indorsed upon the paper by me. I accept the modification of the title suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise for information. I wish to know whether by this resolution the gentleman seeks to have the same standard of intelligence among the voters throughout the country.

Mr. JULIAN. It does not raise any question as to the intelligence of voters.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to know, in other words, whether the gentleman intends to educate the people generally up to the standard of Massachusetts, or to educate the people of Massachusetts up to the standard of the negro.

Mr. JULIAN. There is no question of intelligence raised in the resolution; if there were I fear it would be troublesome to the gentleman's constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I cannot hear the gentleman's reply; I presume it is pretty apt; but he has not given us any explanation of the general bearing of this resolution as regards the rule of equalization.

Mr. JULIAN. The resolution I think is in pretty good English, and if the gentleman had listened to it he would probably have comprehended perfectly its drift.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECONSTRUCTION ACT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 12th instant, estimates of the Adjutant General and Paymaster General for additional appropriations to carry into effect the reconstruction act; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WARD, at three o'clock and ten minutes, moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House adjourns the reconstruction bill cannot be signed and sent to the President until Monday.

The motion to adjourn was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN I move a recess until four o'clock.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by making it eight o'clock.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I doubt whether we shall get the bill from the Senate by four o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable, but unless some member objects the Chair will not interrupt debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason I suggested an early hour was that the bill might go to the Executive at the earliest possible moment. I will modify my motion by making it five o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. Is there any likelihood that the bill will be here by that time?

Mr. KELSEY. Would it be in order to suspend the rules and discuss matters and things in general now?

The SPEAKER. Not pending a motion for recess. If any gentleman objects the Chair will arrest debate.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I modify my amendment by saying seven o'clock.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the amendment by substituting four o'clock.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, namely, to substitute four o'clock, there were—ayes 60, noes 29.

Mr. BEAMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL as amended, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the original motion as amended; and being put, there were—ayes 59, noes 28.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 55, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Baker, Barnes, Boyer, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Dixon, Driggs, Ela, Fields, Finney, Fox, Getz, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hooper, Julian, George V. Lawrence, Mercer, Myers, Niblack, Plants, Price, Robertson, Scofield, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taylor, Taber, Twichell, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, William Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Cullom, Dawes, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Gravely, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Ketcham, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loughridge, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Newcomb, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Polsley, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Blaine, Bromwell, Brooks, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Churchill, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Eekley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Ladin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, Van Arnam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—70.

So the House refused to take a recess.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. SHELLABARGER for the remainder of the session.

PRINTING FOR THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask leave to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution referred to it last evening in regard to the printing of the Departments, with a substitute in the form of a bill. It is a bill explanatory of section ten of chapter eighty-seven of the law of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, passed March 2, 1867.

No objection was made, and the bill was received and read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state that the amendment reported by the committee does not make any material change in the joint resolution as referred, but we have described the act to which it is an amendment by its proper title.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to the supplementary reconstruction bill.

COMMUNICATION FROM STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BANKS. I wish to present a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a report of the resident minister of the United States at Quito, republic of Ecuador, relative to persons claiming to be naturalized citizens of the United States residing in that country.

I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the rules of the House to know whether what I now desire is in the nature of a privileged question or a personal right; but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in reply to a question which I propounded to him, entered at some length into the question of the position of the southern States, and inasmuch as I could not get the floor to reply to him, I ask unanimous consent of the House to print the remarks which I desired to make.

No objection was made.

Mr. VAN TRUMP's remarks will be published in the Appendix.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SCOFIELD. On the 5th of this month, a week ago yesterday, a resolution was passed calling upon the President of the United States to inform the House what States had adopted the fourteenth article of the Constitution. I wish to inquire of the Speaker if any response has been received to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. No response has been received.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MUNGEN. I rise to ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. UPSON. How long will the gentleman require?

Mr. MUNGEN. Well, about a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

No objection was made.

Mr. MUNGEN. It is in reference to a remark which fell this morning, I suppose inadvertently, from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] in speaking of the committee to inquire into the sufferings of Union prisoners or of rebel prisoners. In speaking of it he said that some of its members were good Union men and the friends of Union soldiers; but he left me out in the cold, and the implication might be that I am not a Union man or a good friend of the Union soldiers. I would simply ask the gentleman whether he meant that or not?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before I proceed to answer that question I would inquire if any of my colleagues would like to have the floor. [Laughter.] If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MUNGEN] construed my remark as implicating him among the enemies of the Union or of Union soldiers I am glad that he has called my attention to it.

I intended no such thing. I know nothing whatever of the past political career of the gentleman from Ohio. I simply know that he is associated on this floor with the Democratic party. I understand, however, that he was an officer of a Union regiment, fighting on our side during the war; and I am only surprised that he is not on our side since the war. I certainly think the gentleman has misunderstood the purport of my remarks. I intended no reflection upon him whatever. I do not remember making any discrimination with regard to the various gentlemen on the committee. If I did, I intended to discriminate only in a political sense, meaning that a majority of them belong to the party to which I belong, the members of which I designate as "our friends," while the minority, as I supposed, belong to the Democratic party, the members of which I designate as "our political enemies." I meant nothing more. I did not mean that they were the enemies of the Union or of Union soldiers. I hope this explanation is satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. MUNGEN. The gentleman's explanation is perfectly satisfactory to me.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports.

No reports were presented.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States for resolutions.

FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. MILLER. I offer the following resolution, upon which I ask consent to make an explanation:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, requested to cause to be printed, for the use of the members of this House, ten thousand copies of the forms of proceeding in bankruptcy, as promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] making an explanation in reference to this resolution? By the rule, a resolution presented under this order must, if it gives rise to debate, go over.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has amended this resolution in the manner I suggested yesterday?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; and I think that when the gentleman shall have heard my explanation he will see that he was under a misapprehension in making that suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, I desire in the first place that the Clerk shall read the tenth section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States subject to the provisions of this act shall frame general orders for the following purposes:

For regulating the practice and procedure of the district courts in bankruptcy, and the several forms of petitions, orders, and other proceedings to be used in said courts in all matters under this act;

For regulating the duties of the various officers of said courts;

For regulating the fees payable, and the charges and costs to be allowed, except such as are established by this act or by law, with respect to all proceedings in bankruptcy before said courts, not exceeding the rate of fees now allowed by law for similar services in other proceedings;

For regulating the practice and procedure upon appeals;

For regulating the filing, custody, and inspection of records;

And generally for carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

After such general orders shall have been so framed, they, or any of them, may be rescinded or varied, and other general orders may be framed in manner aforesaid, and all such general orders so framed shall, from time to time, be reported to Congress, with such suggestions as said justices may think proper.

Mr. ROSS. I raise the point of order that this resolution must go, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] is correct. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] has unanimous consent to make an explanation. When he shall have concluded, the resolution will be referred.

Mr. ROSS. I have no objection to hearing the explanation.

Mr. MILLER. Under the bankruptcy act the justices of the Supreme Court were authorized to frame rules and regulations for the government of proceedings in bankruptcy. They have done so. The Senate has ordered the printing of two thousand copies of these rules and regulations. The type has already been set; so that if the House should order copies of the document there would be no expense but that of the paper.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire whether there is anything in the law providing that Congress shall print these blanks for the convenience of lawyers?

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT A. PARRISH.

On motion of Mr. O'NEILL, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Robert A. Parrish.

NAVY ACTIVE LIST.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House whether any officer of the Navy has been retained on the active list after having been fifty-five years or longer in the service, and after he should have been retired by law; and if so, by whose order and authority.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. NOELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the heads of the Departments of War, Navy, State, Interior, Treasury, and Post Office are requested to inform the House of the names of the clerks in their respective Departments, their salary, and the term of service of each, and the district, State, or Territory from which appointed.

Mr. CULLOM. I object.

Mr. NOELL. The gentleman comes from the West, and he ought not to object to its being shown that these appointees come mostly from the East.

Objection being made, the resolution was accordingly laid over.

POST ROAD.

Mr. HOLBROOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a certain post road, which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when appointed.

PETITION FROM ARKANSAS—AGAIN.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House received and referred a petition from the Legislature of Arkansas in regard to levees, and demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. BURR. The gentleman who presented the petition is not now in his seat, and I suggest that the matter had better be deferred for the present.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I do not wish to do anything that may be regarded as discourteous, and will consent that the subject shall be postponed until Monday next, after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATION.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to move to discharge the select Committee on Reconstruction from the further consideration of a joint resolution to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States. The joint resolution declares that for the purpose of carrying into effect the above-named acts there shall be appropriated out of the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, $1,675,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to suspend the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to state that I think the money is being squandered. I will ask the Clerk to read a brief paragraph from a Republican paper, published yesterday, in regard to General Sickles, showing the pomp and ceremony with which he performs his duty. He is a great deal more of a harlequin, I reckon, than our friend in Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

"General Sickles, commander of the Carolinas, lives in great state in Charleston. He appears on the streets on pleasant afternoons in a carriage, driving four splendid black horses, with splendid silver mountings, generally with his daughter beside him, and a servant in livery behind. Of course this splendid establishment attracts the unbounded enthusiasm of the negro population."

Several MEMBERS. Who is the editor?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is by Thurlow Weed, a Republican.

Mr. BINGHAM. One word as to that article. It seems to me fit that a man who has lost his limb in maintaining on the field of battle the supremacy of the Constitution and the majesty of violated law of the Republic should be allowed to ride in a coach-and-four. [Applause.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire if it requires more horses to draw a man with one leg than with two? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Certain gentlemen went up to Canada with the aid of their two legs and no horses. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] as I have heard, made a charge in the late war which, if he had followed up, might have taken him to Canada. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. That is an old lie, which has been exploded in the teeth of liars long ago.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed the gentleman would get nervous over it. I know he has contradicted it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I renew the demand for the previous question, and decline to yield further.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask a pertinent question. Upon what information or what estimate of the War Department is this appropriation asked for? In considering an appropriation of such a large amount of money it is proper that the House should be in possession of information which will warrant us in passing it. Here is a naked resolution, without rhyme or reason, appropriating a very large amount of money.

Mr. BINGHAM. My answer to the gentleman is that the estimate has been made by the War Department under the requirement of this House; it has been reported to the House and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire if General Sickles does not claim that he wants the whole amount of this appropriation for the two Carolinas?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not so understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps the gentleman will allow the estimate to be read.

Several MEMBERS. It is before us.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 73, noes 19, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 20, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Buckland, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Daves, Dixon, Driggs, Fla. Ferriss, Finney, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketchum, Keontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Perlman, Peters, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Seefeld, Selye, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader O. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Haight, Holman, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sigreaves, Taber, Van Auken, and Van Trump—20.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Brownwell, Brooks, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Kitchen, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Ponerooy, Pruyn, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Windom, and Wood—66.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet at seven o'clock on Monday evening. And I will state in explanation of my motion that I am told that there is no possibility of our getting the veto during the day session if we meet at twelve o'clock; that we certainly cannot get it before the evening.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts so as to provide that the House shall meet at ten o'clock on Tuesday morning.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire which of those gentlemen opposite has had a personal interview with the President to inquire when the veto would come in? I suppose it must be the gentleman from the Lancaster district of Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will modify my motion so as to provide that the House shall meet at the usual hour on Tuesday.

The question was taken on Mr. INGERSOLL'S amendment, and there were—ayes 41, noes 53.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. HOOPER'S motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if any gentleman objects it will require a suspension of the rules, inasmuch as the gentleman's motion proposes to change the hour of meeting.

Several members objected.

Mr. HOOPER. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to submit my motion.

The question was taken; and (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOOPER, (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITION, ETC.

The following petition, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Miss Eugenia Washington, praying that Congress may purchase a sword formerly belonging to General Washington.

By Mr. BANKS: The memorial of Elias Howe, for the extension of his patent as the inventor of the sewing-machine for the term of seven years from the 10th of September, 1867.

IN SENATE.

Monday, July 15, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. Gray, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio, appeared in his seat.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate take up the resolution that I laid on the table on Saturday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rule of the Senate limiting business be suspended, so far as to allow the consideration of the bill (S. No. 124) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As this is a question peculiarly belonging to the majority, perhaps it is not my province to interpose. If it is the pleasure of the majority to take up and pass this bill, I suppose I ought not to object; but I think the rule of the Senate adopted at the commencement of this session was a wise one; and indeed I think it would have been better if Congress were not in session at this time at all. I am in favor of standing rigidly by that rule. I have objected to taking up measures that I felt were in and of themselves right enough; but if we open the door at all, we cannot tell how far we may go before we close it, and as I think there is nothing for the Senate to do this morning, I move an adjournment.

Mr. RAMSEY. We had better have an executive session, I think. There are some nominations to be reported and acted on.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that is proper enough. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend that motion while I present a letter which seems to be addressed to the Senate, and it had perhaps better be read?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

ANTIETAM NATIONAL CEMETERY DEDICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a letter which he will have read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

184 EAST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, July 8, 1867.

Sir: A committee of arrangements appointed by the board of management of the Antietam National Cemetery have fixed upon the 17th day of July, 1867, the anniversary of the battle from which it derives its name, for the dedication of the same, and constitute the undersigned a special committee to secure the attendance of yourself and the members and other officers of the body over which you preside.

In fulfilling this pleasant duty, in consideration of the favorable influence upon others, which an early assurance of your compliance with this invitation would not fail to have, and in grateful remembrance of what Congress have already done for the sepulture of the nation's heroic dead, we shall await your acceptance of it with no little concern, giving, as it would, proof of the continuance of your sympathy in the patriotic work committed, in part, to the board which we represent, by States having dead on the field of Antietam.

Asking that you will lay this communication before the Senate at your earliest convenience, we beg to subscribe ourselves,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. E. SNODGRASS,

THOMAS A. BOULLT,

G. L. CRANMER,

Special Committee of Invitation.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE,

President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This seems to be an invitation to the Senators of this body to attend on the occasion named, and of course it is proper to lay it before the Senate. The communication will lie on the table if no other disposition of it be proposed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Now, as a test question whether the Senate will stand by its rule, I move, in antagonism to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course I did not expect the vote of the Senator from Indiana for the bill giving suffrage throughout this country without distinction of color. He is against it naturally by all the professions of his life. Therefore, when he moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of other business, he is acting logically according to his convictions and practice. I am not surprised at the motion. I shall not oppose it now, because looking around I find that the attendance is so thin that I cannot hope to bring the question to a final decision. Possibly, after discussion, even my friend from Indiana may change his whole system of policy. Who knows? He, too, may see light, and he may see that my bill is the only effectual way of carrying suffrage into Indiana. He will see that without my bill equal suffrage cannot be established in Indiana; and then inspired by democratic ideas—I speak of democratic ideas in the true sense—who knows that he may not sustain the bill? I welcome him to the ranks of equal justice; but for the present I shall make no opposition to his motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not necessary for the Senator to express any surprise or make any remark about the fact that I make this opposition. This rule of the Senate was adopted before I was able to be present. I thought when I came to learn of it that it was right. I understand it was adopted by a very decided majority that the Senate would not go into the consideration of other business. If the Senate should go into the consideration of other business, however, I think that logically, to return the compliment of the Senator, he is right; not that I ever expect to support his bill, but I think that there is just as much authority under the Constitution for Congress to regulate suffrage in Indiana as in any other State of this Union.

I am very clearly of opinion, however, that there is a lack of authority to control that subject in any State; but I think he is simply in advance logically of the other gentlemen of his party when he demands the same legislation for one State that they demand in another. If it is right to regulate suffrage in one State, it is right in another; but my purpose is by this motion to test the question whether it is the pleasure of the Senate to stand by the rule. There is no legislative business requiring us to stay in session; there is some executive business that perhaps might be attended to to-day; therefore I make the motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY.]

Mr. HARLAN. I shall vote for the Senator's motion for an executive session, but not on the grounds that he presents. I may feel it to be my duty to vote to rescind the rule to which he refers, but as there is some executive business requiring an executive session during the day, I have no objection to his motion and shall vote for it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After half an hour spent therein, the doors were reopened.

EXPLANATION:

Mr. ROSS. Owing to indisposition I was not able to be in my seat on Saturday, and was, therefore, unable to vote on the reconstruction bill which was finally passed on that day. I desire to state that if I had been here I should have voted for the bill which was then finally disposed of by the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MUSTER ROLLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause certain muster-out rolls to be photographed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the bill which has just come from the other House be taken up for the purpose of reference.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it will not be referred.

House joint resolution No. 72 was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to the second reading?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. WILSON. It is the greatest imposition ever put on any member of Congress to suppose that the thing proposed is within the range of possibility. It cannot be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read. To facilitate the payment of the additional bounty allowed to soldiers of the United States under the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, it proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to have photographic copies made of the muster-out rolls of all organizations which were employed during the war of rebellion, the members of which are entitled to bounty under that act, of which rolls duplicate copies are to be furnished to the Paymaster General, one to be retained by him, and one furnished for use in the division of referred claims. The negative plates from which these copies are taken are to be at once destroyed. Fifty thousand dollars is proposed to be appropriated to carry the resolution into effect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg pardon of the Senate; it is not the bill I thought it was. I know nothing about this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to the second reading of the bill?

Mr. WILSON. I do; and in doing so I wish simply to say that while the object of this bill is a good one it is utterly impossible to photograph these rolls. They are patched up, and with pieces pasted on them in such a way that it cannot be done. If they were whole and perfect the photographic copies would have to be read with a powerful glass. If they were perfect rolls, without any interlineation or any pieces put on them, it would not hasten the thing at all. The truth is that nothing can be done in this matter, and therefore I do not propose to take up the bill at this time; but I hope we shall pass a resolution calling on the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury to see if some plan can be devised to hasten the completion of this work. When we passed the bounty bill, it was not supposed the work could be completed under three or four years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator objects to the second reading of the bill, and it goes over accordingly.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States. To carry into effect those acts it proposes to appropriate $1,675,000.

Mr. WILSON. When I introduced the bill making this appropriation information was called for in regard to it. The House of Representatives had the same information we had, with the difference that the paper of the Adjutant General and the Paymaster General was sent to the House directly by the Secretary of War as evidence on which to found action, and the paper was sent here by the order of the Secretary of War, signed by General Schriver. I have been to the pay department this morning, and I have had placed in my hands the reports of the commanders of the several departments. They were asked to make estimates of the cost of carrying out the law in their several departments, and they have gone into a detailed statement, stating for what they want the money, how many boards of registration they have, the number of persons on the boards, the amount of time consumed, the number of clerks, the amount required for printing, the mileage or traveling expenses, and all matters of that kind pertaining to the work. We have in the bill we passed the other day lengthened out the time a month, which will add to the expense, and there has been an estimate made of that. But I will say that no money will be drawn, no matter what we appropriate, by these officers, except on the presentation of the items in each individual case. If we appropriate the amount in the resolution and it is not called for, it will remain in the Treasury. I have here the report of each of the five generals, in which they go into details in each of their departments as to the necessary cost. I think some of them are very low and some of them seem to me to be pretty large estimates of what will be necessary for this work; but we ourselves have added perhaps from one fourth to one third of the expense by authorizing the commanders to extend the time for making the registration a month, going from the 1st of September to the 1st of October.

Mr. POMEROY. The thing I did not understand was that some of these commanders asked for not more than thirty or forty thousand dollars in addition to what they had had, while others asked for $300,000. I could not understand why there was such a difference between the expenses of one district and another. Has the Senator anything to account for this difference? It is not because the districts are so much larger, but I see that in one or two districts the addition asked for is some three hundred thousand dollars, while in districts equally as large not more than forty or fifty thousand dollars is asked for. I cannot for myself understand why one district is so much more expensive than another. If the Senator has any information on that subject, I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. The first district, General Schofield's district, includes the State of Virginia. He made his appointments very early,

I think before any other officer, and he detailed a larger number of Army officers on boards that receive their pay from the Army direct. Therefore the expenses in his district have been very much less than some others in that respect. Besides, in Virginia there is a smaller number of persons to be registered than in other districts. Then take the next district, General Sickles's. In South Carolina they have one hundred and twenty-five boards, and the cost of those boards is estimated for a certain number of days, the amount set down, and the cost of travel or mileage, at $160,000. The officers have not yet been appointed. The work is to be done. In North Carolina there are one hundred and fifty boards, and the cost is estimated at $192,000. The number of days' work and the cost of traveling are all set down. Then there is an estimate of the cost of printing and books and papers and other matters of that kind. His estimates are larger than those of any other officer.

Mr. POMEROY. What is the amount?

Mr. WILSON. The balance of appropriation asked for is $461,805 for his district. General Sheridan's district includes Louisiana and Texas. Texas is a very large country, and the expenses there will necessarily be very great. There will be a large number of officers there. General Ord's and General Pope's demands are less; General Pope's remarkably so, for the extent of his district, including Alabama, Georgia, and Florida.

Mr. POMEROY. I notice that when the Department divided the money we appropriated originally, $500,000, they divided it equally among these several commanders, as if the Department thought their expenses would be about alike; and yet when they come to make their estimates, we find a deficiency in one of over four hundred thousand dollars, while the deficiency in another is less than thirty thousand dollars. That is the point I cannot understand.

Mr. WILSON. The deficiency in General Ord's district is $245,539. It covers Arkansas and Mississippi. He has three hundred and forty-eight registrars employed for Mississippi, and one hundred and sixty-eight for Arkansas, and one hundred and sixteen clerks. General Pope's whole expenses, including what he has already received and what he estimates for, are $125,000, which, considering the extent of territory of his district, is certainly very small it seems to me. The expense in General Schofield's district is less than in some of the others, principally from the fact that he has employed so many Army officers. He detailed them early, and acted in that matter before any other commander. By detailing so many from the Army he has saved a very large amount of expense to the Government. He asks for $80,000.

If Senators think the sum of $1,675,000, as contained in the bill passed by the House of Representatives, is too large, they can reduce it. I do not believe all that money is wanted for that purpose; but I leave the matter in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I called the attention of the Senate on Saturday to the proposition on the table. It struck me with very great surprise that an appropriation of $1,600,000 should be asked for without any detailed statement, and more especially that the statement which was sent in, short as it was, had not been apparently sanctioned by the Secretary of War. I do not understand now, although the Secretary of War has signed the letter which transmits that statement to the House of Representatives, that he has recommended that appropriation. But upon looking at the statement in its details, such as they were, I was forcibly struck with what seemed to me to be a singular discrepancy between the action of these several commanders, a great difference between the amounts which they respectively require.

General Pope, who commands one of the districts, consisting, I think, of Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, has had some ninety-seven thousand dollars, and only requires $27,000 more. General Sickles, who received $69,000 under the former appropriation, and whose district is composed, I believe, of South Carolina and North Carolina alone, wants $461,000, making, if we give it to him, the expenses in his district upward of five hundred thousand dollars. General Sheridan, who commands the district consisting of Louisiana and Texas, has received $166,000, and wanted for one month, which at the time he made his statement he supposed might be the extent of time for registration, some two hundred and forty-five thousand dollars more; and then he goes on to estimate for the amount that would be required if an additional month should become necessary, and still another additional month, making the amount which he would require upward of six hundred thousand dollars. Without going over all the districts in detail, I will present a statement which I have made up from the paper read the other day of the amount required by each district commander and what he has already received, showing of course the total amount which he will have received if the request be granted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish that the estimates which the Senator from Massachusetts has in his possession were in some way made accessible to the public, in order that there may be a just attention directed to the expenditures which shall hereafter be incurred by these officers. They are not before us in any official form and subject to motion; but it would be, I submit, a very proper thing that the Senator from Massachusetts should in some way insert them in the Congressional Globe.

There are two modes by which these estimates may be enormously reduced. First, by the employment in other districts of the same mode which has been adopted by General Schofield; that is, so far as officers and privates of capacity are within the command of the general, that they shall be employed in this duty. By that means a very large and very considerable reduction could no doubt be secured in the other districts, except, possibly, that of General Pope. Then there is another mode by which these generals no doubt might reduce estimates possibly one third or one half, according to the statements as I get them; and that is by not requiring that the boards of registration should sit in continuous session. If the time is extended to the 1st of October, those boards might take a recess of a month or two, giving notice when they would reassemble again. By this means full opportunity would be afforded to all citizens to be registered without our incurring the expense of keeping up these boards the whole time until the period when the proceeding of registration is to close.

I submit, in view of these two considerations which I have mentioned showing how these expenditures may be reduced below the amount estimated, and in view of the fact that upon the very face of these estimates some of them must be greatly beyond any requirement of the public service, that we ought to reduce this appropriation very largely. I will therefore submit a motion that the appropriation be reduced to the sum of $1,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether that will be enough or not. It seems to me the amount in the resolution is too large, and I had proposed to put it at a million and a quarter; but we shall be here again in a few months, and I do not think there will be any trouble about it. Therefore I shall not oppose the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to add to the resolution the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War," so as to be sure that it shall go through the War Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator probably ought to inquire into the effect of that amendment. That might withdraw the expenditure of money from the supervision of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. I have not the slightest objection to the Secretary of War directing the expenditure of the money; but the law should be so framed that the expenditures themselves should pass under the review of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. In some cases, during the war especially, this language in an act directing money to be expended under the order of particular officers has been held to dispense with the otherwise legal examination by the accounting officers. That ought to be avoided in all cases. The Secretary of War, as a matter of course, has not the opportunity, the time, or the means to examine the details of this expenditure. It is proper enough that he should direct the expenditure; but the details of the expenditure, the accounts, &c., should pass under proper supervision.

Mr. WILSON. At the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I withdraw this amendment. It was pressed upon me by Senators about me who thought it would be a check. With the explanation made by the Senator certainly I have no objection to passing the resolution without these words. Whether they be inserted or not, these are Army officers acting under the control of the War Department, and they will make their estimates and send their bill to the War Department and the War Department will make requisitions on the Treasury Department to pay the expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. The difference would be that if these words were inserted the order of the Secretary of War would be final as to amounts in the adjustment of the accounts, because the law expressly said the money should be expended under his direction.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment. The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the resolution to be read the third time. The joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of this resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, and Patterson of Tennessee—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, and Williams—21.

So the joint resolution was passed.

RELIEF OF DESERTERS.

Mr. POMEROY. I gave notice on Saturday that I desired to call up for consideration the House bill No. 108; it is a bill relating to some soldiers who were reported as deserters; it has already passed the House and come here. I ask for its present consideration, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. WILSON. If that bill is to be taken up in the form it is now, I think we ought not to act upon it. Here is a proposition to remove the penalties of desertion from men who left their regiments and went home. Of course it carries with it bounty, back pay, and pension. There is not a man who fought the battles of the country who will not feel outraged if such a system as that is adopted. I am willing to aid in getting up a plan to remove disabilities; but I think we ought not to put upon the Treasury this expense, and say to the world that men who deserted their regiments and went home are to stand on the same footing with men who stayed in their regiments and fought the battles of the country to the end.

Mr. POMEROY. When the bill comes up, the Senator from Massachusetts will be at liberty to move any amendment, and perhaps I shall not resist any amendment of the kind he suggests. The hardship that results to certain soldiers whose cases have come to my attention is this: soldiers who were enlisted, many of them for the war, after the surrender of Lee and Johnston were returned to their several States with a view of being mustered out, and some of them, supposing that they had served their full term, the term for which they had enlisted, as their muster-out was delayed in some cases several days, and sometimes weeks, went home and they were returned on the rolls as deserters. This bill is simply to relieve them from the penalties of desertion in such cases. If it is not sufficiently restricted it ought to be, so as to relieve only that class of soldiers who served through the entire war, and, as they thought, to the full end of their enlistment and left their regiments because the mustering officer did not appear on the day they expected and they were detained in camp near their homes, some of them in sight of their homes, waiting for some mustering officer, and while that delay was in progress went home. If the bill is not sufficiently restricted I am willing to restrict it; but certainly we ought to relieve that class of soldiers, and it is for that purpose that I call for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What was the decision of the Chair upon the question of order that was made? When a motion was interposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] I presented to the Chair the question of order, whether the resolution of the Senate having been adopted as a rule for this session, and the time for its reconsideration having passed, it is now in order to suspend or control it. I submitted to the Chair that the resolution having been adopted by the body as a rule for the session cannot be suspended. It perhaps may be repealed, I do not know how that is. The point as presented is that the resolution cannot be suspended for a particular purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notice was given on Saturday of a motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of taking up this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. When I called for the consideration of the bill I remarked that agreeably to the notice which I gave on Saturday I made the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question involves simply the suspension of the rule for the taking up of this bill. If that prevails the next question will be on taking it up.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to taking up the bill; but I should like to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs. If referred I believe we shall take it into consideration and report it back in a short time. I cannot consent to the bill in the form in which it is or to anything that is going to put a burden on the Treasury.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the reference; but I want the bill taken up first.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the bill read for information before I vote even on the question of taking it up. I have no objection to taking up a bill which shall be certainly confined to the object which I understand it is had in view. I am told there are in all some ninety-three thousand deserters standing as such upon the rolls. Now, a bill which even runs the risk, however slight that risk may be, of embracing all those men and restoring them as to pay, as to rights, and as to standing of all sorts to an equality with the men who bore the heat and burden of the war and never did desert, is so objectionable that it is unnecessary to argue it. I should like to know for one what is the precise provision of the bill; and before voting even to take it up, I should want to be assured that it was very carefully guarded. I understand that there is already a decision of the officers of the Government as to the rights of deserters under certain proclamations that have been issued; and I conceive that if there is any subject as to which this body ought to be careful, it is a subject which may run in any possible aspect or in any event into untying and loosening any of the disabilities or deprivations of pay which may now be imposed upon deserters at large. If, as I say, the bill is confined to what I understand prompted it in this case, I for one have no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the object of the bill is to relieve soldiers who at the close of the war, after the cessation of active hostilities, after the surrender of the rebel armies, left the service and went home. At that time, I am aware of the fact that there was great dissatisfaction in the Army on account of our soldiers having been kept for months. Some of the regiments were sent into the Indian country; others were sent into Texas; some of them were kept many months in the service; and I incline to think some of them are in the service even now.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that as to the men to whom he now refers, I have every disposition to relieve them, and to vote to relieve all other men who were only technically or accidentally deserters. I only speak of the danger, by unguarded legislation, of opening the door to the whole ninety-three thousand men, or whatever the number may be, who are recorded as deserters.

Mr. WILSON. So I understand. Now, in regard to this class of men, I agree with the Senator from New York; I feel kindly toward them. I know that they felt, many of them, that the Government exacted more than they had agreed to. But I think every soldier in this country will feel outraged if we remove the stigma and the penalties of desertion from those men, who from the opening of the war until the defeat of Lee and the capture of Richmond, deserted our armies and went home, and place them on the same footing with the men who fought bravely through the war. I would be willing to pardon them, to take off disabilities; but to vote them back pay, pensions, and bounties, would be an outrage upon the soldiers who fought the battles of the country and remained true.

Mr. CONKLING. And on the tax-payers.

Mr. WILSON. If we were to do such a thing as that, the bounty-jumpers would seize the occasion to come forward and make claims on the Government. Indeed, sir, I am told that there is a class of claim agents who have examined everything of record here, who have sent into the States and got the names of vast numbers who deserted, who are writing letters to them promising to get their disabilities removed if the deserters will agree to pay to the claim agents the back pay and the bounties which they would receive in that event. I think we cannot be too guarded and too careful in legislating on this whole subject. I am willing to take up this bill, but I think it should be referred either to the Military Committee or the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the reference of this bill to the Military Committee. I wish, however, to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no proposition here to pay men who deserted before the surrender. He has a virtuous indignation, which is shared in, of course, by everybody, toward men who deserted before the surrender. There is nothing here that is in sympathy with claim agents. The point of the bill and what we desire is to relieve cases of peculiar hardship, to which even the Senator from New York is not opposed. I only want the bill taken up and considered by the committee and reported on at the earliest possible moment, with as many safeguards as they choose to put about the measure, so that it accomplishes the object I have in view; that is to relieve those who ought to be relieved; relieve those who served through the war, and are only technically deserters. That is all we propose to do in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not know anything about the contents of the bill until my attention was called to it by a colleague of mine in the other House. I have since read the bill, and I find that it is confined to two specific classes of deserters, so-called. First, those who after the war was over, believing that their enlistment had expired by law, went home before they were formally discharged. I have always believed that the enlistment by law expired on the surrender of the rebel forces, and that any other construction was a harsh one against the soldier, which the Government ought not to exact. Many of these soldiers, believing that they had served their country during the full term of their enlistment, went to their homes, and they were entered on the rolls as deserters. The bill also applies to another class of persons who were entered as deserter on the rolls, but actually afterward returned to their duty in the service under the proclamation of the President, and should thus be relieved from disability.

This matter is of peculiar interest to the people of Ohio from another consideration. The Legislature at its last session proposed a constitutional amendment, one of the provisions of which disfranchises from the right to vote or hold office all deserters. The result is that men who served faithfully during the war, upon whom there is no moral turpitude, who believed that they were acting in pursuance of their enlistment, many of them veteran soldiers who had served four years, will be disfranchised and disabled from holding office. As these men are not really deserters except technically, as they do not come within the meaning of the word "desertion," as their act involved no moral turpitude, they ought to be relieved from this disability. I perceive that the bill is carefully guarded. It does not give them any extra pay or any bounty, but simply gives them pay up to the time they actually left the service.

I have no objection as a matter of course to the proposed reference of the bill, but I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will report upon it so that it can be acted upon at this session. In our own State it involves a great many persons and may involve very serious results. I therefore solicit the attention of the Military Committee so that in some form we may pass it. I do not care what clogs or limitations are added to it, or what guards are thrown around it; but certainly we ought not to enforce these disabilities against persons who were not strictly deserters.

Mr. CONKLING. I should still like to hear the bill read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The first section provides that no soldier or sailor shall be held or taken to be a deserter from the Army or Navy who voluntarily enlisted to serve and did faithfully serve the prescribed period of his enlistment until April 19, 1865, and who, without proper authority or leave first obtained, did quit his command or refuse to serve after that date.

The second section provides that any volunteer soldier or sailor who may at any time have absented himself from service, and who voluntarily returned to duty and returned to his command and remained there until it was regularly mustered out, or who was killed in battle or died before the expiration of his term of service, shall not be classed as a deserter.

The third section proposes to direct the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under such rules and regulations as they may prescribe, to cause all applications of soldiers or sailors of the classes before described as deserters, asking for a correction of the rolls or to be reinstated, which may hereafter be presented to their respective Departments, to be examined, and if it shall be found that the applicant voluntarily entered the service and faithfully served the term of his enlistment or until April 19, 1865, and only left the service after that date, his name shall be replaced upon the rolls and he shall be entitled to his pay up to the day he so left the service, but shall not receive any additional or extra pay. Such a person is also to be entitled to a discharge, setting forth the facts as they exist, and is not to be subject to any penalty, disability, or forfeiture of citizenship as a deserter.

Section four proposes to vacate and set aside all dishonorable discharges given to any soldier or sailor included within the previous provisions for such alleged desertion or refusal to serve.

The fifth section provides that when any soldier or sailor of the late war whose name is borne on the rolls as a deserter, shall present to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy satisfactory proof that the desertion was only technical and without intention to abandon the service, the Secretary may give him a certificate that his record of desertion has been canceled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I objected to the consideration of this bill, for the reason that I think this whole subject should be considered very carefully and fully. At this session it ought not to be taken up. There are other cases that appeal, in my judgment, to Congress for relief, that ought to be considered in this connection. Therefore I object to the consideration of the bill at this session; and I raise the point that the resolution of the Senate cannot be suspended. It may possibly be repealed or rescinded, and then the action of the Senate is left free; but it does not stand like a rule of the body which is subject to the practice of suspension, if there be any such practice in the Senate, and I am not sure whether there is or not. I believe in all other cases the rules are suspended by unanimous consent. I think the Chair decided on Friday or Saturday that the rules could not be suspended by any majority, or two-thirds vote, as in the other House; that it can only be done by unanimous consent. Now this is a resolution which stands as the decision of this body, which I submit to the Chair, and can only be repealed or rescinded in the regular way, and cannot be suspended unless by unanimous consent. Of course any business may be done by unanimous consent. Upon this point, I ask the decision of the Chair. The merit of this bill has been somewhat discussed. I do not choose to discuss it at all; I think under the resolution it cannot come before the body.

Mr. POMEROY. Any motion to modify or repeal a rule cannot be acted upon the day the motion is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose the question of order is not debatable.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not desire to debate it; but I gave notice on Saturday that I should make this motion to-day to repeal so much of the resolution of the Senate as interferes or conflicts with the consideration of this bill. That is the notice which I gave.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The point of order I make is, that that motion is not in order. The rules do not allow a motion to rescind or modify a rule of the Senate. A change of rules requires one day's notice. But the proposition of the Senator is not a proposition to amend the rules or to rescind the rules, but a proposition to declare that this rule shall not be applied to a particular proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order having been made, it is not debatable in the first instance, and the Chair must decide it in the light he has. After the decision of the Chair has been made, then on appeal the question will be open to debate. I suppose that by the rules of the Senate a standing rule cannot be modified or rescinded except after at least one day's notice. In this case I understand that notice was given that a motion would be made to suspend or modify the rule for the purpose of taking up this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. It is not a rule of the Senate that is in conflict with this. It is a resolution we passed at the opening of the session, which is confined to this session. It is not a resolution to be standing here perpetually; it is only for this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not suppose that makes any difference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the notice given by the Senator from Kansas may be read from the Journal of Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following extract from the Journal of Saturday last:

"Mr. POMEROY gave notice that on Monday next he would move to suspend or repeal so much of the resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, limiting the legislation of the present session, as would enable the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes it is in order under that notice now to make the motion. The motion is in order to suspend, according to that notice, the rule for the purpose of taking up this bill; and the motion is under the control of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. From that decision of the Chair I appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The rules of the Senate may be changed and amended, or any particular rule may be repealed or rescinded by resolution. That resolution being presented to the body to amend the rules or to repeal any portion of them, must lie over one day. It cannot be considered if objection be made on the day it is presented. As I understand it, such a resolution falls within the rule governing the introduction of any other resolution. Now, what is the purpose of the Senator from Kansas? It is not a proposition to amend the rules; it is not a proposition to rescind any rule; but stripping it of its language it is simply a proposition to declare that a resolution of the Senate shall not apply to a particular bill; in other words, that we will transact business in disregard of a rule which his resolution leaves in force. He does not propose to repeal the resolution; he does not propose to change the resolution, but for the time being and in regard to this particular bill, that the resolution shall not be the law of the Senate. That is what he proposes. I say that is not in order. We may amend our rules; I admit we may rescind them; but we cannot declare that for a particular piece of business the rule is not the law of the Senate. On that ground I think the motion is out of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am a little surprised that so clear-headed a gentleman as we all know our friend from Indiana to be cannot see that the Senate could not pass an order which it might not in some way change, modify, or revoke at its pleasure. In the House of Representatives, to change a rule requires two thirds. Here a majority is sufficient. But for the rule that has been referred to, a majority might revoke any order, any rule, at any time, without reflection or consideration; but to guard against hasty action, the rule of the Senate requires that one day's notice shall be given of the intention to change an order or rule of the Senate. That has been given in this case, so that the only limitation on our power made by the rules has been applied. The case is so clear that I am surprised that my friend from Indiana should appeal from the decision of the Chair. That is rarely done in this body except where there is very grave question.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot doubt that under the rules of the Senate, and according to its practice we may change the rule pro tanto, if I may so express myself, by a majority vote, but as the Senator from Ohio says on proper notice. Notice has been given and we are now in condition to make the change. Had the notice been given for a proposition to rescind the rule or to change it entirely, I presume no Senator would doubt that it could be done; but the notice has not been given to that extent, but simply to the extent of modifying the rule so far as to allow the introduction of certain business. I cannot doubt that such a notice is according to the usage of the Senate; and I will go further now, as I am up, and state that I shall vote for it, because I am anxious to secure to every measure an opportunity of being heard; but in voting for its consideration I would have it understood that I do not mean to pledge myself with regard to the bill. I mean to keep that question open.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The honorable Senator from Ohio did not understand the precise point that I made. I do not question that by resolution we may repeal a resolution of the body. I do not question that we may rescind a rule of the body; but that is not the proposition before the Senate. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas is, that the rule of the Senate remaining such shall not apply, for the time being, to a particular piece of business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator whether that is anything more or less than a modification of the rule?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it is not a modification of the rule at all. You may amend the rule by declaring that hereafter it shall only apply to a particular class of business, such as to joint resolutions, or such as to bills, and to nothing else. I do not question that you may amend it; but this is not an amendment of the rule itself, but a declaration that for the time being its force is suspended. Does the Senator from Maine think we can suspend a rule by a majority vote, that we can leave a rule standing and yet suspend it until we act in disregard of it? That is the precise question that is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. There are one or two rules that we are in the habit toward the close of every session of suspending for the session, relative to receiving bills from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there is a special provision for that, giving authority to do so under the 26th Rule.

Mr. POMEROY. I know there is, but it shows that we have the power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It shows you have the power as far as it is granted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, we are to judge of this argument by the result at which we arrive. The practical result is that a mere majority of the Senate by a proceeding of this kind can suspend any of its rules, provided always that you commence twenty-four hours before the act is perfected. Therefore, instead of the Senate being protected against haste by the requirement of a two-thirds vote to suspend a rule, as is the case in the House of Representatives, business is subject to a mere vote of a majority, and the importance and effect of your rules as a check upon legislation is almost entirely removed. We have heretofore supposed that you may do this, that, and the other thing by unanimous consent, but that a two-thirds vote of the Senate could not disturb the order of our business. The practical result of having such motions as that now submitted and indorsing them as in order will be that hereafter the rules of the Senate may be suspended by a mere majority upon any particular occasion whenever a majority may desire to act, and we shall be in a worse situation with reference to the integrity and operation of our rules than even the House of Representatives, when we supposed that we were acting under more stringent and salutary principles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I understand the Chair to rule that it is in order to suspend a rule or order of the Senate, or the operation of it, upon a day's notice, or any other notice, and that the appeal is taken from that abstract decision I shall be obliged to vote against the decision of the Chair; but if I understand the Chair to rule that under this notice of the Senator from Kansas it is in order to proceed to the consideration of this bill, then I believe the Chair to be right under the latter branch of the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, that is, that this order be so far modified as to permit that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not intend to decide any more than the question before it; that is, that the notice was to modify the rule so that this bill might be taken up, and notice having been given of that, the Chair supposed the greater included the less. If you could rescind a rule on such a notice, I suppose you might modify it for any particular purpose like this. That was the idea the Chair had.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that opinion I concur; and I rose to say, understanding the language of the Chair differently, and desiring to understand what the meaning of it was, that I do not think we can suspend a rule of order on a day's notice any better than we can do it immediately, because that is an entirely different thing. The suspension of a rule is one thing and the repeal or modification of it is another. We cannot suspend a rule at all, unless there is provision for it, on any amount of notice. At least so it appears to me. Understanding now the ruling of the Chair, I deem it correct, and shall vote to sustain it.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not give notice of suspending the rule of the Senate, but notice to suspend it so far as should be necessary to enable us to consider this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that on the mere question of order, whether the Chair is right in the ruling, I shall be compelled to vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair, believing it to be right; but when we come to the question of proceeding to the consideration of the bill, that is another question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Quite a different question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So far as the mere ruling of the Chair is concerned I think it is right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My opinion on this question is changed; but after hearing the expression of experienced Senators upon it, that it is right to amend a resolution of this sort so as to let in one particular bill, I must yield to their judgment. I think its effect is simply to suspend the rule; that is my opinion about it now; but as Senators for whom I have so much respect differ with me on that question I withdraw the appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal being withdrawn, the question is on taking up the bill named by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question as to whether it is desirable to go into general legislation may as well be settled on this motion as on any other that I know of. This is one of a class of a great many bills that interest certain sections of the country. Every section of the country has its share of that sort of bills. There may be merit upon which this bill is founded; I presume there is some. There may be many cases which might justly claim the protection that this bill would give; but I am satisfied that the bill contains elements that will require a good deal of discussion; that questions of finance will be involved in it, the expenditure of public money, of how far it is necessary to go to protect the Treasury against claims for bounties, extra pay, allowances for clothing, and a variety of considerations that always surround cases of that description. Now I do not see any reason, I confess, why this bill, more than half a dozen others that have been laid on your table, should be passed at this session; and therefore it is that I shall be obliged, without committing myself as to the perfect merit of the bill itself either way, to vote against taking it up, because I have heard no good special reason assigned why there is any just cause for haste. It has been said that some people are in prison charged with desertion. If any people are in prison charged with desertion who come within what is said to be the proper scope of the bill, that is, persons who left their commands after the surrender of Lee in good faith, satisfied their time was out and that it was right for them to go home, I undertake to say that it would require only an application on the part of any Senator or Representative from any State where such a case existed to the War Department to obtain an order that that person shall be discharged on his own recognizance. To say the least, I think that if there were any Vermonter imprisoned under such circumstances, of whom I could go to the Secretary of War and truly say that I was satisfied it was a case of innocent technical breach of the law, he would have sufficient faith in my word to say that the soldier should not be kept in prison—that he should be discharged on his own recognizance.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a question of habeas corpus, but a question whether these men shall be disfranchised under the laws disfranchising deserters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that; but I was now alluding to what was said to me the other day by a distinguished Senator that there was necessity for haste on account of the hardship of certain persons being imprisoned. As to that, I think that in any case which would commend itself to the favorable consideration of any Senator or Representative so that he would feel authorized to make an application of that behalf, the soldier would have his liberty.

Now, as to disfranchisement: we have always held as to all State elections and matters certainly, that that was a matter of State cognizance and that the States were to decide who among their citizens were to be entitled to vote or to be disqualified for crimes that were committed. Certainly, whether so or not, these facts must have existed since 1865, when these armies were disbanded; and there can be, therefore, now no special reason that I understand why we should proceed at this time to make haste to enfranchise or to disfranchise any of these classes of persons, because under that head it falls into the general class of legislation which at the proper time and in the ordinary way of course we all expect to attend to.

Mr. HOWE. Some of the Senate may remember that when this resolution, which it is now proposed to modify, was before the Senate, I remonstrated as strongly as I knew how against the passage of it. I thought the doors of legislation should be left open to the whole country, that anybody might be allowed to introduce a bill here and have it passed upon according to its merits. The Senate thought otherwise; and by a very decided majority agreed to this resolution, which has excluded so far the whole people of the country, except in reference to specified subjects. Now, Mr. President, whatever has been said or whatever can be said hereafter in reference to the merits of this measure before the Senate, I must be allowed to say for one that while all the rest of the nation is excluded from these Halls, I do not think it is worth while for us to reach out and drag in the deserters here for relief to the exclusion of everybody else. Until, therefore, you consent to open these doors to everybody, to those who have not deserted, I shall not agree to open them to those who have, even although the desertion may be said to be technical.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to hear the class of men described in this bill characterized as deserters. Technically they may be; but the Senator from Wisconsin certainly would not desire to perpetuate a stigma that is cast by the construction of a law, as I think wrongly put on the law, upon a class of men who served their country for four years during the war, and served until the end of the war. The only interest I feel in the bill is an interest that I get from my colleagues in the other House who are more familiar with the details and the facts than I am. Under the construction put upon the law, as I understand, quite a number of soldiers, not only from Ohio, but from all the States, who served their country to the close of the war, until every rebel arm had been laid down, until there was no hostile force in the United States, are stigmatized as deserters. They believed their service was then at an end. I believe so now. I believe that under the terms of their enlistment they were entitled to their discharge. I believe the authorities of the War Department thought so; but they believed the condition of the country justified them in giving a different construction to the enlistment. I myself served as an enlisting officer, and uniformly told all the men that when the war was over, even if it should be within the three years, they would be entitled to their discharge. I have seen statements posted all over the country, signed by officers of the Army, that the enlistment was for three years, if the war should so long continue; and if it did not continue so long the enlistment would be at an end. On the faith of that many of these enlistments were made. Many of the men served more than three years; and then some of them reenlisted. Foolishly, however, they put their own construction on the law, and went home. I do not justify that. By so doing they lost their pay; they lost their bounty; they lost the honors which they had fairly won for their previous service. Now, in addition to all that, on account of the patriotism of some of our States, they are about to be branded with exclusion from office and from the right to vote.

Do Senators desire that? I do not care how you limit the bill, how you restrict it and restrain it; I do not care how much you affect their pay, their bounty, their emoluments. Let them forfeit all these, because they acted foolishly in giving their construction to the law. But is it right that you should inflict upon them the stigma of being classed as deserters, when they are not, in the true sense of the word, deserters? That infamy ought not to be stamped upon them. You will find cases of this kind in every one of the loyal States.

I do not know anything about the rule which Senators have been commenting upon. I was not here when it was adopted, and I have not yet been able to read the debate on the subject, and to understand how far that rule goes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The case is out of the rule now.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the rule is out of the way, the only question is whether we ought not now, when we have nothing else to do, to correct this injustice as far as we can. Let the Military Committee take up this bill, strip it of every objectionable feature; if they think it ought not to go further than merely to remove the disabilities in the class of cases to which I have referred, let them do that. It seems to me it is not time misspent, and that it ought to be done now; because if we postpone it until next winter, as a matter of course these men will be deprived of their right to vote and their right to hold office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to ask him where is the difficulty in any State making provision for these exceptional and merely technical cases? If the State of Vermont wishes to disfranchise deserters, why can she not say in her constitution or in her law,

"We disfranchise all deserters; but no man shall be considered as a deserter who in good faith, after the surrender of Lee, left his ranks and went home?"

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that. The difficulty is because the Legislatures are not in session. Congress would not have declared a person of this character a deserter if they had foreseen all the events that arose afterward, and known the circumstances connected with these cases. The Legislatures of the States are not in session, however. Take the case of my own State; there for a patriotic purpose, to stamp with infamy men who had deserted their country in the hour of trial and need, after enlisting into its service, it is proposed to exclude permanently from voting all persons who are really deserters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Legislature can rectify that.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is not in session. Mr. EDMUNDS. It can do it when it meets again.

Mr. SHERMAN. The difficulty is that the constitutional amendment of which I have spoken is submitted under the laws of the State of Ohio to the people of the State. That constitutional amendment embraces two propositions: first, that there shall be no distinction in the State of Ohio on account of color in voting; and second, that deserters shall not vote. Will you endanger the first provision by refusing at this time, when you have the opportunity, to relieve from this stigma of desertion a class of men who served faithfully during the war? Will you say that the Legislature ought not to have made this provision? It is there and it cannot be changed; there is no power by which it can be changed. The vote must be taken on it before you meet again.

This is the case in the State I represent upon the hasty information given to me; but it is the case also all over the United States that the construction given to the law will disfranchise many honorable men; men who have won scars in your service, and will stamp the name of many of them with infamy. Many of these men reentered the service after the time when they went home foolishly. In some cases they are dead, and their children are to be stamped with this infamy, because it is an infamy to be branded as a deserter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean that any returned to the service after they left on the 19th of April—went back and served again?

Mr. SHERMAN. Doubtless some went back, joined their regiments when they found that this thing was wrong.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regiments were mustered out within a very few months after that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend is mistaken. Some men were held for more than a year after that. Two regiments that I knew were held and sent to Texas, and served in the most offensive of all services, remote, far from home, for nearly a year after their real term of enlistment had expired. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] can tell how many thousands, probably one hundred thousand men, were kept in service months and months after their enlistment expired, many of them from our State. Many of them, when they found that they had put a wrong construction on the law, and that the penalties were likely to be very severe, returned again to their regiments; but still that fatal mark stands on the muster-roll against them, and although they served their country afterward and in some cases died in the service, that word "deserter" stands opposite their names on the muster-roll. It seems to me that we ought to correct the injustice in this case, where it is so manifest and plain, leaving the doubtful cases to be settled hereafter.

Mr. HOWARD. I would beg to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether there is anything in the constitution of his State that will prohibit the Legislature from relieving in such cases as those to which he refers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt very much whether the Legislature could give any construction to or change or affect the constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. Is the Senator quite sure that the bill on our table now will operate to relieve that class of persons from the disabilities against which he complains? I entertain some doubt about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The framers of the bill are of that opinion; but if there is any doubt about it the bill is to go to the Military Committee, and they can examine it. The last section in the bill I am not prepared to vote for; I think the bill should be modified; but the main purpose and idea of the bill it seems to me ought to be acted upon. I hope the Senate will see the matter as I do, and let the subject go to the Military Committee for decision.

Mr. HOWE. This is a bill for the relief of a certain portion of the people of the United States. I called them deserters, because they are called deserters in the bill. The Senator from Ohio insists now, as he insisted before, that they are only technically deserters. That may be so. Of course I do not prejudge that question; but they belong to one of two classes of men; either to a class of men who, during the war, in the heat of the service, deserted their regiments and their standards and left the field, and afterward repenting returned, perhaps before the surrender, perhaps after the surrender of the rebel armies, (I do not know which, for it covers both cases,) or to a class of men who, thinking or pretending that they had served, or believing, if you please, that they had served to the end of the required term, after the surrender of the rebel armies, in defiance of the authority of the United States, refused to serve any longer, left the post of duty and went to their homes, while their comrades remained still obedient to the authority of the nation. These are the two classes of men provided for in this bill. Just how much merit they may have of course I am not prepared to say here now. The Senator says I cannot wish to perpetuate a stigma on them. I cannot have any wish about it. I do not know how many of my own fellow-citizens belonging to the State of Wisconsin may be included within the relief intended by this bill. I simply know that neither class of those described in the bill are the most meritorious men we have in Wisconsin, and while you exclude all the rest from these Halls I am not prepared to let them in.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that on the motion to take up the bill for the purpose of referring it to a committee we shall not have any further discussion. Indeed, this discussion is really out of order. I hope we may have a vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I differ from the Senator from Kansas in opinion. This vote is to determine whether we are to enter upon general legislation or not.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit that that question has been decided.

Mr. HOWE. When was it decided?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I say the taking up of this bill will determine by the vote of the Senate whether we are to enter upon other business except those measures which relate to reconstruction; and therefore the present question, the question of taking up this bill by a vote of the Senate, is more important vastly than it would be under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit that the Senate have decided that the motion is in order to proceed to the consideration of this bill. They have not decided that it is in order to proceed to the consideration of other bills. The question now simply is, it having been decided to be in order to take this bill up for consideration, whether we shall so take it up.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And if we take this bill up because it is said to be a bill of merit relating to the general legislation necessary for the country, there is no ground left for resisting an appeal for taking up another measure. Therefore, sir, I repeat that the present vote of the Senate is to determine whether we are to enter upon general legislative business or not. We cannot resist an appeal in favor of another measure which may be brought before us if it appear to have merit, as the Senator from Kansas thinks this bill has.

But what I rose to speak to is the necessity of the action of Congress at this time upon this particular measure for the purpose of affording relief to the deserters spoken of. If it can be shown that there is no necessity or pretense of necessity why Congress should act at this time in order to extend relief to those persons, all argument for taking up this bill, for departing from the course which we hitherto pursued, is removed from the debate.

Now, sir, there is no provision in the constitution of Ohio, the State which has been alluded to, disfranchising deserters. That question is to be voted upon at the fall election; but for the time being all those persons in whose behalf the appeal is made are entitled to vote, so far as anything in the constitution of that State is concerned. There will be no disfranchisement of anybody for desertion under the constitution of Ohio if you do not proceed to act at this session; and if it be desired to remove disabilities from persons of that class, it can be done at the next regular session of Congress, after full debate, and in a bill which shall include all other cases that ought to be excluded from the operation of our former law. There will then be no general election in that State after this exclusion comes into effect until the fall of 1868, and it will be perfectly competent for Congress to extend any relief which it may think proper to the class of persons who have been alluded to in this debate. I suppose this answers the only argument of importance which has been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to reply to one observation of the Senator before he takes his seat, so that he may have the reply in his mind. I do not make the point myself. The constitution of the State of Ohio declares that every white male citizen of the United States having a certain age and certain residence shall be entitled to vote. A law of Congress, passed, I think, in 1863, denationalizes deserters. The question is then raised whether under the constitution of Ohio as it now stands, any deserter can vote, whether he is a citizen within the meaning of our constitution. Considerable doubt exists in the State whether or not these persons, although innocent of the moral turpitude of desertion, can vote under the existing constitution. I do not give any opinion upon that point myself, but it is claimed that the effect of the act of Congress was to denationalize them, and as the voters must be citizens of the United States, the question is whether they can vote under the existing constitution. We are, therefore, embarrassed by that matter.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will answer the Senator on that point, because I have a complete reply, I think, and one that will satisfy him; but before I give it I will go on and state in a word what I proposed to add when the Senator rose to interrupt me; and that is, that if we take up this bill for consideration, it must be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it must come back again to the Senate, and it must and it will be debated thoroughly upon this floor, consuming a great amount of time. It is not to be expected that Congress shall interpose in favor of one class of men who are harshly dealt with by the existing law, without having other cases of hardship heard in debate, and amendments proposed concerning them.

And now a few words as to the point which the Senator from Ohio has just made, and which I understand to be this: that under the State constitution the right of voting is limited to citizens who shall possess certain local qualifications, residence, &c. We are perfectly familiar with all that question in Pennsylvania, and there is no difficulty about it. I believe that the constitution of our State is very similar on that subject to the constitution of Ohio, and it has been held throughout our State by our courts, by the local courts, and by the supreme court of the State, that the act of Congress of 1863 has no effect upon electoral qualifications in that State until a person who is accused of desertion has been, according to the terms of the United States law, sent before a military tribunal for trial and has been tried and convicted. That decision has been made by judges of both political parties in my State, and it has been held as sound and valid law, under the constitution of Pennsylvania, by the supreme court. It is, therefore, the undoubted law of the State that no person can be disfranchised under an act of the Legislature for desertion until he shall have been tried in the manner pointed out by the act of Congress of 1863. Now, what does that provide? It provides that persons who shall desert from the public service shall forfeit their status as citizens of the United States, and that they shall be arrested and immediately sent by the officer arresting them to the nearest military post to be put upon trial before a military court. That is the tribunal appointed by the act of Congress for the trial of those cases, and until that tribunal has acted and pronounced the judgment of the law upon these persons they are not deprived of their citizenship; there is no judgment of law against them, and no State law can come in and deprive them of citizenship upon pretense that there has been adjudged against them a forfeiture under the laws of the United States.

The question has been so well determined in my State that at the coming October election I suppose no person will be deprived of the right to vote by virtue of the act of 1863, unless there be a record of a military court produced adjudging him to be guilty, and pronouncing against him the penalty of the law. Then only can it be argued that our State legislation comes into action, and takes effect upon his case. I do not enter into the question whether such an argument would be sound or not, although I have a clear opinion upon it. But its present discussion is unnecessary.

Now, sir, we know that there were none of those persons alluded to by the Senator from Ohio ever tried by a military court; that is, persons who left the ranks after the termination of the war. In fact there was an order issued from the War Department discontinuing all proceedings in cases of desertion. It was not desired by the Government that the enormous expense of investigating these cases should be incurred; and an additional reason was that the necessities of the public service did not require that these cases should be investigated.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there in Pennsylvania an oath required of electors, which oath is to the effect, among other things, that they did not desert or flee the draft? There is such an oath required by the statutes of several of the States; and I should like to know, even on the theory the Senator suggests, what would become of a person's right to vote under such a statute as that—a statute requiring him, in case he was challenged, to take an oath to the effect that he had not deserted?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think such a man ought not to vote, if he has actually been in the service of the United States and has left it. Prima facie, until some excuse is made for him, I think he ought not to vote. But I understand this question belongs to a different class of cases. This question ordinarily arises in the case of non-reporting drafted men who have never actually been in the service, and who may or who may not have some excuse. There is no such oath as that to which the Senator alludes in my State.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I prefer that this whole subject should lie over for this session. I am not prepared to decide it now. I do not think it proper that we should infringe the rule we have adopted. But I have risen to say that I think my colleague is somewhat in error in regard to the decisions in Pennsylvania. I know there was a decision of the supreme court, carried, I think, by one majority on the bench, somewhat to the effect that he states; but I think as a general thing the judges of the different courts of the State have not believed that that was a correct decision, and the impression prevails, to some extent at any rate, that it was governed by political feelings. My colleague is a lawyer; I am not; and of course he ought to be better acquainted with the decisions of the courts than I am. I know that there is a strong feeling in the State against allowing deserters to vote; and I know that in many of our districts at the next election any man who deserted, if proof can be brought before the election officers of that fact, will not be permitted to vote.

I am in favor of what I suppose to be the intention of this bill; but I think no harm will be done by letting the question lie over until next session. In the mean time the matter can be investigated. My own judgment is in favor of relieving everybody who actually performed duty until the end of the war. I think the decision of the War Department wrong that detained men a day after the war was entirely over, or at any rate a day longer than the necessary machinery could be got to work to muster them out of the service. I am aware of the fact that volunteers from Pennsylvania were sent away to Texas and served there months after the war was over, and I think some of them are there still; particularly a colored regiment. Some men are still in service who enlisted only to serve during the war. That is unjust to those men, and I was not surprised that many high-minded men who entered the service from the best motives, motives of patriotism, should have deserted, if you call it desertion; should have gone to their homes when they felt that they had performed their duty and fulfilled their contract.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Because of the position that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania once held as Secretary of War, I desire to ask his opinion as to the precise time when the war did close. My opinion is very clear upon that question; but I should like to have his opinion upon it. The enlistment was for a term of years or during the war. Now, it is claimed that the soldier had a right to decide that question. Very able statesmen may differ upon it, and I should like to know of the Senator when the war did close.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not say that the soldier had a right to decide when the war did close, and I did not mean to have it supposed that I said so. What I said was that I was not surprised that many high-minded men, having served during the whole war, and feeling that they were detained long after their enlistment expired, in violation of their contract with the Government, should have left the ranks. I remember a case at the first battle of Bull Run. I happened to be there the day before the battle. Several of the regiments had served out their time. General Scott made what I supposed to be a mere technical decision that their term of service should commence from the time that they had been mustered into the service here in Washington. I said they were entitled to their discharge in three months from the date that they mustered themselves into their organization and marched for their destination. I remember particularly the case of the regiment from Rhode Island which came here under the auspices of the present Senator from that State, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] The officers of that regiment came to me and said that feeling that they had performed their whole duty they did not want to stay longer unless somebody in authority would say to them their services were important to the interests of the country, that while they were willing to stay in an emergency they desired to have understood that they had performed their duty. They said they would stay as long as it was necessary for the interests of the country, and especially until the battle was over. On such terms the Rhode Island regiment engaged in that battle and fought so gallantly as history records they did.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I was about concluding what I had to say when I gave way to my colleague. My remarks at this time have been directed, or at least I intended to direct them, to the single point of the absence of any necessity for present action, and while I say this I desire it to be distinctly understood that I am strongly in favor of the proposition contained in this bill. At the next session of Congress, if I am here, and this subject shall come up, I shall very cheerfully give it my support.

As to what my colleague has said about the decisions of the courts in our State, I do not care to go into a debate on that subject. I simply wish to enter my protest against his statement of the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I submit to the Chair that there is a prior question to the one that is now stated by the Chair. The question is: Will the Senate agree to the modification of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Kansas pursuant to his notice of Saturday last? The Senate has not agreed to modify the resolution yet. That is the first question. Then the question will arise, Will the Senate take up the bill? It is not in order yet to propose to take up the bill until the Senate agrees to modify the resolution so far as to allow that. So the first question upon which the Senate are called upon to vote will be, Shall the resolution be so modified as to allow the taking up of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so decided, from which the Senator took an appeal, and afterward withdrew his appeal and left the decision of the Chair standing; that it was in order to proceed under that notice to call up the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will avoid my friend's technicality and move, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas, that the rule referred to be so modified that this bill be now taken up for consideration; that the rule be modified to that extent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So as to allow the taking up of this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the ordinary form, I may say, in which the motion is put in the other House, and we had better adopt that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well; the Chair will put it in the way suggested, if that be agreeable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not appeal from the decision of the Chair that the rule was modified. The Chair did not undertake to decide; but the Chair decided that it was competent for the Senator to move to modify the rule as he proposed. From that I appealed; but upon that motion there has been no vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is right about that. The question is on modifying the rule so as to take up the bill alluded to for consideration.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Henderson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Williams—16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate agree to modify the rule for the purpose of taking up the bill. The question now is on taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will now receive its first reading.

The bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot be referred until it has received its second reading.

The bill was then read a second time by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that motion by referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no bill before Congress, or likely to come before us, that involves more legal and constitutional questions than are embraced in this bill, and that is the appropriate committee to which it should be referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be referred to the Judiciary Committee. It is certainly a matter relating to military affairs with which the Military Committee are known to be familiar. The Committee on Military Affairs understand all the laws in regard to deserters and their operation. It is a matter that has never been taken cognizance of by the Committee on the Judiciary. It would involve an examination by that committee which would take time; and I will state to the Senator from Iowa that that committee have had their full share of the labors of this session, and this is a matter that properly belongs to the Military Committee. I trust it will not be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the House having directed the reenrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, after its return by the President of the United States on the request of the House to correct an error, the reenrolled bill had been signed by the Speaker of the House; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of War and the Attorney General, containing the information called for by the resolution of the 3d instant requesting the President "to communicate to the Senate copies of all orders, instructions, circular letters, or letters of advice issued to the respective military officers assigned to the command of the several military districts under the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the act supplementary thereto, passed March 23, 1867; also copies of all opinions given to him by the Attorney General of the United States touching the construction and interpretation of said acts, and of all correspondence relating to the operation, construction, or execution of said acts that may have taken place between himself and any of said commanders, or between him and the General of the Army, or between the latter and any of the said commanders touching the same subjects; also copies of all orders issued by any of said commanders in carrying out the provisions of said acts, or either of them; also that he inform the Senate what progress has been made in the matter of registration under said acts, and whether the sum of money heretofore appropriated for carrying them out is probably sufficient."

In answer to that portion of the resolution which inquires whether the sum of money heretofore appropriated for carrying these acts into effect is probably sufficient, reference is made to the accompanying report of the Secretary of War. It will be seen from that report that the appropriation of $500,000 made in the act approved March 30, 1867, for the purpose of carrying into effect an "act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed March 23, 1867, has already been expended by the commanders of the several military districts; and that in addition the sum of $1,648,277 is required for present purposes.

It is exceedingly difficult at the present time to estimate the probable expense of carrying into full effect the two acts of March last and the bill which passed the two Houses of Congress on the 13th instant. If the existing governments of ten States of the Union are to be deposed, and the entire machinery is to be placed under the exclusive control and authority of the respective district commanders, all the expenditures incident to the administration of such governments must necessarily be incurred by the Federal Government. It is believed that, in addition to the $2,100,000 already expended or estimated for, the sum which would be required for this purpose would not be less than $14,000,000—the aggregate amount expended prior to the rebellion in the administration of their respective governments by the ten States embraced in the provisions of these acts.

This sum would no doubt be considerably augmented if the machinery of these States is to be operated by the Federal Government, and would be largely increased if the United States, by abolishing the existing State governments, should become responsible for liabilities incurred by them before the rebellion in laudable efforts to develop their resources, and in no wise created for insurrectionary or revolutionary purposes. The debts of these States, thus legitimately incurred, when accurately ascertained, will, it is believed, approximate a hundred million dollars; and they are held not only by our own citizens, among whom are residents of portions of the country which have ever remained loyal to the Union, but by persons who are the subjects of foreign Governments. It is worthy the consideration of Congress and the country whether, if the Federal Government by its action were to assume such obligations, so large an addition to our public expenditures would not seriously impair the credit of the nation; or, on the other hand, whether the refusal of Congress to guaranty the payment of the debts of these States, after having displaced or abolished their State governments, would not be viewed as a violation of good faith and a repudiation by the national Legislature of liabilities which these States had justly and legally incurred.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1867.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not sympathize at all with the message in its prognostications about the liability of the United States to pay the debts of these reconstructed States. I look upon all that in the message as purely a false alarm started for the purpose of shaking the nerves of creditors and other persons interested in these new governments of Mr. Johnson. All that is pure moonshine, according to my apprehension, thrown in for the mere purpose of producing a party effect and agitating public opinion and public credit. But I will not go into the message further than to make that simple observation. I move that the message and accompanying documents be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Senator from Michigan is justified under the principles of public law in stating that that portion of the message to which he refers is moonshine or is calculated simply to excite a false alarm. The Senator from Michigan will hardly question the proposition of law, that the conqueror in acquiring territory by conquest does not acquire that territory free from the obligations and debts of the government overcome, existing at the time of the commencement of hostilities; and if these southern States, according to the present doctrine and policy of the majority, are to be held as conquered territory, governments deposed and in their stead governments established by Congress, under what obligation does Congress, or rather does the Government of the United States acquire this territory by conquest? Will the Senator say that the State governments which were found in existence at the time of the commencement of hostilities, and which many believed continued to exist as governments de jure and de facto during the war and up to the close of the war, being suppressed and wiped out of existence by the authority of the Government of the United States, and other governments being established in their stead, the debt which was owed by those States has ceased to exist, or that Congress can impose that debt upon a separate government which it may establish down there?

The President of the United States has expressed no positive opinion on this question, but he has made the suggestion, and my attention has not been called to this subject for the first time by this message. In the fall of 1865, the then Governor of the State of Indiana, who is my present colleague in this body, made a very able speech in vindication of the policy and course of President Johnson at that time, and in that speech he called the attention of the country to the fact that, under law the conqueror does not acquire the conquered country free from the debts owed by the prior government, and that if we hold this country by conquest and suppress existing governments we must look to the question of the indebtedness which may fall upon us. Nearly two years ago, one of the very ablest men of the Republican and now Radical party of the United States, in a very carefully considered speech, expressed the views that are enunciated in this message. So that the Senator from Michigan, in my judgment, is hardly authorized to speak of this view of the subject as "moonshine." It is not to be got rid of quite so easily. The debts that were owed by the southern States at the time of the commencement of hostilities are existing debts still; and if the Government of the United States acquires that country by conquest, holds it by conquest, wipes out of existence the existing governments, and establishes a government there according to its own pleasure, it is worthy of very grave consideration upon whose shoulders the indebtedness of the conquered country must rest.

Mr. President, the Senator will have to meet this question, possibly, in a graver form than he has seen fit to speak of it this morning. He will find the attention of the country attracted to this question. The able speech to which I have referred attracted a great deal of attention at the time. I do not believe that in any possible event these debts are to fall upon the United States, for I believe the State governments have never been out of existence. I do not believe that any ordinance of secession could take them out of the Union. I do not believe the war took them out. I believe they have been, in the eye of the Constitution, States of the Union all the while, and that they rightfully came into the exercise of all their rights and to the discharge of all their duties with the Union at the close of the war, and that their indebtedness remains upon themselves.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOWE. If they were States during the war, were they or were they not entitled to all the rights of States then, including the right of representation in this body?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the question is answered more satisfactorily in the language that has been attributed to Mr. Lincoln than in any language that I can use: by the war, the practical relation of the States in connection with the Union was disturbed; when peace returned it was the business of this Government to see that those practical relations were restored. When practical relations are broken off practical representation ceases.

Mr. HOWE. I agree with that statement, that the practical relations were disturbed. The question I submitted to the Senator from Indiana was, how far they were disturbed; if they were disturbed so far as to deprive them during the war of the right to representation in the Congress of the United States and the Electoral College?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That was the opinion I expressed, that their practical relations being suspended practical representation was necessarily suspended.

Mr. HOWE. Then, in order that I may understand the whole theory of the Senator, I should like to ask what it was, what clause of the Constitution it was which deprived them of the right of representation here so long as they were States? Where did we get our power to deny them the right of representation here if they were States?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that the practical relations of the southern States to the Union were disturbed by virtue of any provision of the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution remained all the while; and during a part of the war, when the practical relations were not so far broken off as to prevent it, some of these States were represented, and were represented with the approval, as I understand, of the Senator from Wisconsin. What was the position of Virginia when I came as a Representative to this body in the middle of the war? She had two Senators here—Senators recognized by the Senator—and I believe both of those Senators came to this body after the commencement of hostilities, after the declaration of secession by the State of Virginia. The Senator himself recognized the right of representation. Sir, the practical disturbance was that which resulted from the war which made, practically, representation impossible.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the practical relation—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator goes on I will ask him a question. Did he believe, in 1863, in the midst of the war, Virginia having seceded, that she was entitled to representation in this body?

Mr. HOWE. I will answer the Senator very promptly and very willingly. The right of Virginia, or her authority in the Union, was no more affected, in my judgment, by her ordinance of secession, than was the authority of Massachusetts by the ordinance of secession passed in Virginia; but by the act of revolution, by the act of rebellion, by the several plain violations of several positive commands of the Constitution which are involved in that rebellion, I thought the question of authority was remitted to the Congress of the United States to say when and how far those rights of a State should be recognized, how far they should not be forfeited; that if Congress chose to recognize any new government set up there, and loyal in fact, as the government of a State, Congress had authority to do so. If Congress denied that authority, Congress had equal authority to deny it. If that is not so, if the political character of a State was still preserved in spite of this rebellion and in spite of all its violations of the Constitution, I have never been able to see how the rights of a State could be denied; and it was that question I wanted the Senator from Indiana to answer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a little difficult for me to say what the answer of the Senator is. He admits that, with his approbation, Virginia was represented here by Senators elected after the ordinance of secession and after the commencement of hostilities; after the revolution commenced, as he says; and I found those Senators holding positions in this body when I came here two years after the commencement of the war. Now, I should like to know of the Senator, if revolution strikes a State from the Union, why it is he recognized the election of Senators by a State in flagrant revolution and war.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator has very ingeniously turned this into a catechism propounded to me, instead of what I wanted it to be, a catechism for his own exercise. [Laughter.] I wished him, not me, to give information. If I cannot get information from the Senator from Indiana upon the points on which I wish instruction I will give him the best I can. I can give you no more information than to repeat what I said: that I do hold there were certain commands in the Constitution resting upon every State which those States that entered into rebellion violated. Among others, there was the command that every one of its officers, executive, judicial, and legislative, should be under an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. They violated that. They had governments that were not under that oath. They were commanded not to enter into any league or compact or alliance with other States. They violated that. Nor with foreign Powers. They sought to do that. They violated very many commands of the Constitution, and then made flagrant war upon the United States to support these violations. I did understand it to be the duty of the President of the United States to enforce every one of these commands; they were the supreme law; and I did understand it to be the duty and right of Congress to clothe the President of the United States with authority, with power, to pass any law to enable him to execute those laws, to enforce those commands, to see that there was no State government which violated those commands; and I thought a very proper way was to abolish those governments. We had not done it when Virginia sent her representatives here; we had not done it when Arkansas sent up her Senators. I thought we ought to have done it. I do not remember whether I voted to admit the Senators from Virginia or not. I did vote, if the question was put to the Senate, and I think it was in the case of the Arkansas Senators, to admit them. I thought they ought to be admitted. I thought the Senate ought to admit them, because they were loyal themselves; they were sent here by a loyal Legislature, representing a loyal constituency; and our law said still that Arkansas was a State. I said in that very connection that I thought Arkansas had done that which authorized us and required us to say that Arkansas should no longer be a State, should no longer be entitled to the right of representation, and that we ought to do that; but until we did it I thought the Senate should obey the law upon its own statute-book. It has been my theory from the beginning down to this time; it is my theory to-day. But upon the theory of the Senator from Indiana, that they were States in fact and States in right, de jure and de facto, just as New York, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Indiana are, I want to know still upon his theory if we were bound to receive Senators from South Carolina and North Carolina sent up here during the war?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know whether the Senator designed what he said as a criticism upon me for asking him the question. It was a question he invited. I did not invite him. I was making a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Michigan; and it is not usually my custom to allow all the questions in any debate to be upon one side. I asked him a very straight question. That question was: if he believes, as he said in his first remarks, that revolution cut these States off?

Mr. HOWE. I did not say so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator was mistaken; I did not say so. I said, on the contrary, that the ordinance of secession of Virginia had no more effect upon her rights or her authority than the same act had upon the authority of Massachusetts; but I thought it made the ground for our action upon the rights of Virginia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, according to the theory of the Senator as now declared, neither the ordinance of secession nor flagrant war disturbed the relation of the States to the Union.

Mr. HOWE. No; I did not say that by any manner of means. I think it did disturb the relations of the State.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think so; that is my theory; but the States, as I understand the Senator now to assume, lose their right of representation by the act of Congress declaring that they are not States. Now, as there was no such act of Congress during the war, and none, as I now recollect, until last spring, declaring the States to be illegal in the South, what took away from the States the right to representation which he recognized in Virginia in the middle of the war?

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that it was lost. Virginia had that right of representation, he says.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was not so much myself as the Senator, for when I came to this body I found these Virginia Senators here.

Mr. HOWE. Then they had not lost the right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is exactly what the Senator says; and as it required an act of Congress, according to his present opinion, to take away from them the right, I want to know what did, at any time during the war, take away from them the right of representation, inasmuch as the acts of Congress never declared that they were separated from the Union, never declared that they were not entitled to representation, never declared that the State governments were illegal until last March. On the contrary, the acts of Congress recognized them as States, the acts of Congress taxing them as States, the acts of Congress apportioning representation among them as States, spoke of them as States. Congress legislating in that direction, and the revolution not disturbing their relations to the Union so far as the right of representation is concerned, I want to know of the Senator what took away from them the right of representation, if it is his pleasure to answer the question?

Mr. HOWE. I never have stated that they lost the right of representation. I say, on the contrary, I think they did not lose the statutory right of representation until we took it away ourselves; that it was conferred, as it is conferred upon every State, by an act of Congress; and that it was never lost in law until it was taken away by act of Congress; but those acts of rebellion were the acts which justified Congress to legislate and to take it away. I do not understand that this right was denied to Virginia. Of course it was not denied while she had Senators on the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course not; and the Senator in allowing representation to Tennessee, in allowing it to Virginia, and in favoring it from Arkansas under elections that took place during the rebellion, after the ordinance of secession, and while war was flagrant, recognized the right of representation; and it is a hard point for him now to tell us when it was and how it was that the States lost the right of representation. Mr. President, my view is that the right of representation is given by the Constitution of the United States—that Constitution that bound the States to the Federal Union—that Constitution which fixed the relations between the Federal and State Governments, that each State of the Union is entitled to two Senators and to at least one Representative in Congress. My view is, that the right of representation does not and cannot depend upon any act of Congress; that Congress has no power to increase or decrease the right of representation of any State in this Union; that it is fixed by the Constitution of the United States. But, on the other hand, my view is very clear, as it has been expressed much better than I can express it by the distinguished statesman to whom I have referred, that by the war the practical relations of the States to the Government were broken, and it became practically impossible for them to be represented in this body; practically they had no right to be represented in this body; the Constitution remaining all the while; the State governments indestructible in their character so far as their relation to the Federal Government was concerned.

Mr. President, I have gone further into this than I thought of at the time I got up. My purpose was simply to respond to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan. I would suggest to him to review his learning somewhat on this subject of the acquisition of territory by conquest, and I think he will give a little more importance to this subject than he has in his remarks this morning.

Mr. SUMNER. It does not seem to me that there is any substantial difference of opinion between the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Indiana thinks the suggestion of the President entirely out of place. He believes that these States may continue hereafter liable for all their honest antecedent debts. The Senator from Michigan believes so likewise; and my friend from Michigan goes further and suggests that the President, in holding up the idea of any possible liability on the part of the nation, was indulging in moonshine. I agree with the Senator from Michigan; that whole suggestion of the President is moonshine, and nothing else. See how it is presented, sir. After setting forth the possible liabilities of the national Government from undertaking to administer the governments of the rebel States, he says:

"This sum would no doubt be considerably augmented if"—

Mark that "if," if you please—

"if the machinery of these States is to be operated by the Federal Government, and would be largely increased if"—

Mark again the "if"—

"if the United States, by abolishing the State governments, should become responsible for liabilities incurred by them before the rebellion in laudable efforts to develop their resources, and in no wise created for insurrectionary or revolutionary purposes. The debts of these States, thus legitimately incurred, when accurately ascertained, will, it is believed, approximate $100,000,000; and they are held, not only by our own citizens, among whom are residents of portions of the country which have ever remained loyal to the Union, but by persons who are the subjects of foreign Governments. It is worthy the consideration of Congress and the country, whether, if the Federal Government, by its action, were to assume such obligations, so large an addition to our expenditures would not seriously impair the credit of the nation; or, on the other hand, whether the refusal of Congress to guaranty the payment of the debts of these States, after having displaced or abolished their State governments, would not be viewed as a violation of good faith and a repudiation by the national Legislature of liabilities which these States had justly and legally incurred."

It will be observed that all this suggestion of the President is placed under the shelter of an "if;" if the national Government is so liable, then such consequences will ensue. Listening to the message, I was reminded of a sentence of Shakspeare: "If is a gaoler to bring forth some horrid malefactor." If the hypothesis of the President is true, it is a horrid malefactor that he has led out; our liabilities surely would be great; but if there is nothing in the hypothesis, then there is no malefactor brought out, and there is no liability on our part.

Now it seems to me as a question of public law, and it is in that way that I meet it, nothing can be clearer than that there is no liability on the part of the national Government. Unquestionably a State lives; and as long as it lives, it carries with it all its original just obligations. I take it, that is a received principle of public law. If we resort to the practice of civilized nations, I may remind you of France, which in the course of fifty years has been administered by a succession of governments, one giving way to another; a monarchy giving way first to a republic; that republic then assuming different forms, finally giving way to a consulate; then again to an empire; then again to a royalty; then again to a royalty in another form; then again to a republic; and then again to an empire; and yet, under all those successive forms, where conquest once intervened, the original liabilities have been continued. Perhaps no more striking illustration of that can be given, than the fact that the pension to the sister of Robespierre, awarded to her shortly after the death of her brother, was paid down to a very late day by the successive governments, having, surely, no sympathy with the family. I believe it may be accepted as a principle of public law which cannot be called in question, that as long as the State exists, its original and just obligations inhere in it, and they cannot be avoided except by annihilation. That is my answer, therefore, to the suggestion of the President. As soon as these States shall be reorganized and again take their place in our Government, they will be under all their original obligations, none of them impaired; nor will there be any additional obligations on our part.

Mr. JOHNSON. The opinion expressed by the President in the message which is before us is hypothetical; but coming from a functionary so distinguished as he is, the President of the United States, it is calculated, if it be wrong at all, to produce some mischief. The debt of the United States, which everybody recognizes as due and to be paid to the last dollar, is very large, and every addition to it increases the public solicitude; and it is therefore at all times unadvisable to express, as I think, any speculative opinion as to the possible increase of that debt. I am sorry, therefore, that the President should have deemed it his duty to express such an opinion in the message before us; for although, as I have stated, he does not give it as a positive opinion, but only expresses it hypothetically, it cannot but serve in some degree to affect our financial credit.

Whether the opinion is right or wrong is a matter upon which I do not propose to express any very decided opinion; but, as at present advised, I am obliged to say that I think it is wrong. These States, even assuming, as I am obliged to assume, the hypothesis of the President to be right, are for a time out of the Union; they are in the hands of the Government of the Union to be molded by that Government and governed by that Government as in its own wisdom it may think proper. For the time, therefore, State existence is at an end. But whether the United States, by holding that relation to the States, has become responsible, or will be responsible for the debts of the States, is a very different inquiry. Nobody pretends that it is the purpose of the Government of the United States to retain these States in the condition of territories. They are held now, in the judgment of us all, only until they can be reinstated in their original condition as States of the Union. But the question suggested by the President is, whether because we hold them in that state of suspense, we become responsible for the debts of those States, as we should be if we became the governors of those States in all time to come.

Now, he says, and my friend from Indiana states the same thing—and to that extent they are both, as I think, clearly right—that the conquest of any existing State does not rid the conqueror of the obligation to pay the debts that the original State may have owed. All the obligations of a conquered State, as between the State conquered and other nations, remain and fall upon the conquering State. All the rights belonging to citizens of the conquered State, as between themselves, remain still as rights to be protected by the conquering State. But suppose a State to be conquered to-day and held for a year or longer, and then receded, the creditors of the conquered States not calling upon the conqueror during the period that he held his conquest, to pay the debts, making no demand, or if making the demand, that demand not being responded to; when the conquered State has been receded or has been recovered by conquest at the instance of the original conquered State, the first conquering State is no longer responsible for the debt; it remains a debt of the original State; and that, I think, was illustrated very clearly in the case of the Government of Spain. Spain was conquered by Napoleon. During that conquest many outrages were perpetrated upon the Government of the United States and upon her citizens. After Spain recovered her sovereignty, after France was driven away, we made a demand upon Spain to pay, not only the original debts which Spain owed the United States, but all the debts which she would have owed if she had not been conquered and had done the acts which gave the United States a right to demand of her indemnity. And we recovered it upon the ground that Spain remained Spain, and was responsible for all the obligations of Spain the very moment she reinstated herself in her original authority.

Now, to apply that precedent to the case before us: suppose—and I concede that for the purpose of the argument—that we are rightfully to be considered as the conquerors of these ten States in the absolute sense of the term; that they are ours to do as we may think proper, to be governed by us we may think expedient, or to be disposed of by us by treaty with other nations; we keep them for a year or more, when they are again States; we recognize them then as States of the Union, invested with all the rights that belonged to them before the rebellion; are we then to be responsible for the debts they originally owed, or are they? Can both be responsible? That they are responsible the United States cannot well deny, because the United States have enforced that doctrine as against Spain, and have always held the doctrine to be a sound one, that if a State has been stricken out of existence by conquest and lost her authority, and she regains it, she is at once liable for all her original engagements. So in relation to Georgia: I mention Georgia by way of illustration. Georgia is conquered, or is supposed to be conquered. We, as the conquerors, hold her under our control. We say to her, we say to her people, "Do certain acts, and you shall again be in the condition in which you were before the contingency happened which justified or made it our duty to conquer you;" and that is done. All her debts revive. Can it be true that with the revival of her obligation to pay her debts that does not terminate (if there ever was such an obligation) any obligation on the part of the United States until she was revived, to pay the same debt? Can the United States be responsible and Georgia be responsible at one and the same time for the same debts? I submit not; and I was about to say but for the hypothetical opinion of the President of the United States, clearly not.

Now, in relation to the other apprehension of the President, that we shall be responsible for the expenses of carrying on these State governments or governing these people as long as we hold them in the condition in which they are: suppose we are, what then? If we are, it is only because they are conquered; and if we are because we are conquerors, we can do what every conqueror can do: we can levy a tax on these States to pay the expense. We are not to charge the expense of governing them upon the loyal States. We are not to consider it as an obligation, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If as conqueror, with a view to what we believe to be their benefit and the benefit of the United States, we think proper to govern them, we have a right to say to them, "You must pay the expense of that government;" and that they are abundantly able to meet, or will be if they are not now abundantly able to meet.

Then the conclusion to which, as I am now advised, I come, is, that we are not responsible at all for any debts contracted by the States before the rebellion; and if we were responsible at all in the first instance to contribute out of the Treasury an amount sufficient to carry on this process of reconstruction, it is an amount for which we shall have a right to tax those States.

I was very glad to hear my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] say—I think it is the first time he has said it in this Chamber—that these States can never die; they cannot commit suicide upon themselves. My recollection is—I may be mistaken, and I suppose I am from the opinion the honorable member expressed just now—that he has more than once said that they were in our hands, just as absolutely ours as if we had conquered them from a foreign nation; just as much in our hands as if there never had been State governments over them, as if they had remained from the time the territory became the territory of the United States by cession a territory. But I understand him now to say that they are States. I beg him to reflect, however, whether he has not in making that admission gone a step too far, whether he has properly considered the consequences of the doctrine which, as I understand him, he is now maintaining. He says that a State can never die; the State of course always lives; that any debts contracted by a State before its supposed death and any debts contracted by a State after its supposed death, or in the interval between its supposed death and its revival into full life, are debts. I beg him to reflect more seriously on that subject. If he is right, the United States may be compelled to pay the rebel debt contracted by the rebel government?

Mr. SUMNER. How so?

Mr. JOHNSON. They have gone abroad and borrowed money.

Mr. SUMNER. That is not an honest debt. I said an honest and just debt.

Mr. JOHNSON. Whether the debt is honest or not is not to be tested by the Government of the United States. We say that they had no right to leave the United States. In that I believe we are unanimous. We say, therefore, that they have never had any authority to contract any debts. I believe in that until now we have been unanimous. But I understood the honorable member to say that during the several revolutions or stages of revolution that happened in France all the debts contracted by each Government to that revolution from time to time were considered eventually as debts due by the nation. If that is logically so, then the debts contracted by these rebel governments will become the debts of the reinstated State governments, or debts of the United States, and I protest against both.

Mr. SUMNER. So do I.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator from Maryland if it is not an illustration of what he is saying. If these States had succeeded in securing what they call their independence, and had been called upon by foreign Governments to pay their obligations contracted during the rebellion, could they set up that they were not honest debts?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not; unquestionably not. Then the question for us to decide is whether if the State government contracting the debt would be bound to admit the legality of the debt, could not get clear of the obligation to pay the debt as between itself and the person holding that debt, the creditor of the State, when we take possession of them as conquerors we become responsible for the debt? We do according to the doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure my friend did not intend it, and therefore it was that I asked the honorable member either to restate his opinion or more maturely to reflect upon the results of that opinion.

But, sir, I rose not so much or at all for that purpose as simply to say that as far as I am now able to come to a conclusion, with all due respect for the opinion of the President of the United States, I do not believe that the opinion expressed by him hypothetically in relation to the debts to be incurred in carrying on our reconstruction acts or the obligation of the United States to make good any debts antecedently contracted by these State governments is at all correct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have but a word or two to say on this subject. I regret very much, with other Senators, that the President has brought this subject before us in the shape that he has. I will not call what he says moonshine, as it has been designated by my friend from Michigan; but it is so exceedingly fallacious in my judgment, and has so very little foundation, that I do not think the President is justified in making this suggestion, even under the circumstances, thus perhaps producing an effect injurious to our credit.

I accede to the correctness of the doctrine laid down by the honorable Senator from Indiana; but as he states it, and with the inference that he draws from it, it seems to me to be quite fallacious when applied to the existing state of facts. What is the foundation of the doctrine? It is that if one nation absorbs a conquered country into itself, deprives it of all revenues, deprives it of government, deprives it of responsibility, and therefore of all power in every way it makes itself the heir or successor to its obligations. That I take to be the principle on which the rule is founded.

Now, sir, what sort of application has a doctrine of that kind, thus founded, to the existing state of facts? When a nation makes war upon another, it may be supposed to do so in order to enforce and protect its own rights; and if, in enforcing and protecting its own rights, it interferes with the obligations that people have assumed toward another and independent nation, it is by no means a ground of complaint on the part of that nation whose obligations are thus interfered with, because every nation has a right to enforce its own claims, if they are just claims, against another; and if, from the necessity of the case, claims of a third party are interfered with, postponed, delayed, it gives no just cause of offense against the nation seeking to enforce its own; and if it becomes necessary, even in the case of independent peoples, to hold them in subjection for a time in order to complete the claim which the conquering nation has on the nation thus conquered, it has a right to do so, and it does not, by taking that course, subject itself to be called upon by third parties to meet their claims. The question is, whether the conquering nation goes further than is necessary, and for such a length of time and under such circumstances as show that they are not satisfied with enforcing their just claims, but mean to absorb and deprive of all power of meeting claims upon it, the nation thus conquered.

We stand even in a better situation than that. The obligation that a State of the Union could assume was perfectly understood by all the world, either toward an individual or toward a foreign Government or a foreign corporation. That obligation is totally independent of the United States; it is like the obligation of an individual; it takes it upon itself. The United States is in no way bound to carry it out, is in no way bound to enforce it, is in no way bound to do anything except not to interfere improperly to prevent the payment by a State of its obligations. If it does thus improperly interfere it might lay the foundation, undoubtedly, of an equitable claim upon itself. Now, what was the condition of things? Here were States over which the United States had a certain right. That right was denied; that right was violated; that obligation was broken. What did the United States do as a people? Simply attempted to enforce, and succeeded in enforcing its own rights of government and its own rights of property. To that extent we went—no further. That was the occasion of the war, and with the occasion ends the war. But the question is whether we have absorbed these people, whether we have deprived them of their power as States improperly, whether we have done anything to prevent the enforcement and collection of any just claims that might exist against them outside of and beyond the proper enforcement of our own just claims upon them as connected with the United States. That is the simple question. And do gentlemen pretend, can the President or anybody else say that by the exercise of our fair judgment in obtaining our rights of empire, if you please to call it so, our rights under the Constitution—the rights of the United States, I mean, as against a State thus setting up its authority in opposition to it—we have placed ourselves, or are liable to place ourselves in a condition where we are bound to discharge all their obligations?

Sir, the pretense seems to me to be an idle one, having no foundation whatever in fact, and affording no just ground for the suggestion that is made in the message to that effect. When the time comes that we have obliterated them; when the time comes that we have so conducted as to show that we mean that they never shall exist as States again, that we mean to deprive them of their power to carry out and discharge the obligations into which they have entered, that we have destroyed them as a people and destroyed them as a government, and mean to do so, it will be time enough then for any claimants upon these States, whether private or public, to say that we have assumed their obligations. Until that time comes, any suggestion of this sort is in my judgment perfectly uncalled for, and ought not to be considered for a moment as having weight enough to alarm even those most likely and most liable to be alarmed for the safety of any claims they may have against the ten or eleven States formerly in rebellion.

As to the other question that has been stated, I do not feel disposed to discuss it. I rose simply to enter my protest with regard even to a suggestion in the present state of things that we had put ourselves in the category supposed possible by the President, and supposed possible by my friend from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before this subject passes from the consideration of the Senate, I desire simply to add that in my view of this subject the Government of the United States can rightfully come under no obligation to pay the debts of the southern States existing prior to the war. I think the war was prosecuted, as it was declared by Congress, for the purpose of maintaining the rightful authority of the Government of the United States; for the purpose of maintaining the Constitution and perpetuating the Union; that that being accomplished by the war, the States restored to their rightful position in the Union, or rather their rightful position being maintained, no obligation whatever rests upon the Government of the United States in regard to their debts. But, sir, I think it is worthy of consideration and reflection what obligations may fall upon the United States in the event that we maintain the doctrine that the States of the South do not rightfully exist, and that in some way or other they have ceased to be legal States, and that they exist, if at all, by the sufferance and permission of the United States, and upon that position we establish down there a government of our own.

In other words, if we strike out of existence the State government, its machinery of officers and of courts, and establish in its stead a government of our own, placing there our own officers, taking control through our own officers, appointed by the United States, of the revenue of these States, and in every way control the States, it is worthy of reflection whether that is not an absorption practically and by force, and in that event what may become of the obligations of the Government. Rightfully there can no obligation rest upon the United States, in my judgment; and the States being held in their relation to the Union as defined by the Constitution, we can incur no obligation. However much their relations may have been interrupted by a rebellion which they bring on, we cannot be responsible to any parties for any loss resulting to them from that. I agree thus far fully with the Senator from Maine; but if we, in fact, strike their State governments out of existence upon the proposition that they are illegal and de jure, do not exist at all, and exist only de facto—that is our position as declared last spring and now—and if upon that position we assume over them all the powers that may be exercised by any Government, we, by our officers, controlling the revenues which might go to the payment of their debts; we, by our officers, declaring how much of those revenues of necessity must go to purposes which we declare and enforce, then it is a practical question of great moment for us whether that is not an absorption upon which obligations may rest upon us. I hope, sir, we shall not go so far; but I am not prepared to say that it is unwise for the President, when he sees that Congress has now declared that these State governments do not exist de jure at all, and that they exist de facto only by our permission and only so far as we do permit, when we are legislating in the direction of taking possession and absorbing these State governments, and making them a part of Federal machinery, it is not unwise, in my judgment, for the President, when he sees this course of legislation initiated, to admonish us of the possible obligations that may be incurred.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana and myself, I think, do not differ at all upon some of the points raised in this discussion. We do not differ as to the original and continued liability of the rebel States, for instance, for all debts contracted ante bellum. Such obligations arose under legitimate governments, recognized by the United States, and are, of course, still binding upon the governments and people of those States and will always remain so as long as there is a people constituting a State. That is natural justice, and that, I understand, is the public law. It is matter of plain common sense and common justice. We agree in this. Then as to all obligations contracted by these several States during the war against the United States and in and of that treasonable war, I take it that we both agree that there is no principle of constitutional law or of public law which in any possible event could make it obligatory upon the Government of the United States to pay those debts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not? The answer is obvious. Those debts were created in hostility to the Government of the United States, and for the purpose of overthrowing that Government; and whatever may be the legal condition of these States, whether they be absolutely conquered States and as such entirely and in all respects and forever subject to the will of their conqueror—a proposition which I have never advanced and am not disposed to advance—or whether they are held by the Government of the United States, in temporary subjection and subjugation as temporarily conquered country, it must result, as a matter of course, that debts contracted by the conquered party in such a contest are debts which can never rest upon the conquering party; for the honorable Senator will not deny that it is the right of every Government in the world to put down and subjugate rebellion. This process is legal and lawful everywhere, at all times, and in all countries. It would be a very strange doctrine, it seems to me, that should make it requisite for the legitimate Government to pay the debts of a rebellious portion of its empire or possessions. It would be simply saying to rebels, "Go on; you are an actual Government now; you govern a portion of the country now by an actual de facto Government; go on; contract such an amount of debt as you please; run your faces as far as you can; and if the old Government shall finally succeed in subjugating you one result will certainly be that the old Government will be compelled to pay your debts;" that is to say, the old Government will be obliged to pay the expenses of both sides of the war. Surely, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Indiana will hold no such doctrine.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose that I gave the Senator occasion to intimate that I had held such a doctrine.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. By no means. I expressed no such view. I simply expressed the view which was much more ably and clearly expressed by the Senator from Maine, that if the conquering nation absorbs the conquered country it absorbs it with its debts before the war. I will not undertake to say that in any event the conqueror can be made responsible for the debts incurred by the conquered country during the war. I am not prepared to say exactly what is the rule on that subject. While the nation is making its resistance and is a de facto government, perhaps de jure, making its resistance against the Government that ultimately becomes the conqueror, it incurs debts. Whether as between independent nations the debts thus incurred during the war would fall upon the conqueror I do not undertake to say now; but certainly no such doctrine could apply in any event between portions of the same country.

Mr. HOWARD. I was entirely right, Mr. President. I have all along felt satisfied that my honorable friend from Indiana would not commit the Democratic party to the payment of the rebel debts. That is an issue with which he certainly will not venture into the campaign. He acts very wisely, and not only acts wisely, but his views are founded on solid sense and solid law, as I believe; and I am extremely happy to hear the honorable Senator make the announcement he has made.

But there is a third state of facts arising in this case. He seems to entertain an apprehension, and expresses it with much more delicacy, I confess, than does the President in the message which is before us, that by some sort of legerdemain it may turn out that these Johnson governments—I use that epithet for brevity's sake—if they are extinguished and go out of existence will leave to the United States the charming legacy of their debts. Well now, sir, I do not sympathize in this apprehension at all; but if the apprehension be well founded, it presents to our minds, if possible, an aggravating view of that state of absolutism and usurpation which Mr. Johnson has indulged in in reference to reconstruction. The ground which he takes in his message, the ground which my honorable friend, I believe on more than one occasion, has taken is, that the President has established the Johnson governments, that he has done it by virtue of his executive power as President of the United States, or as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, or in some capacity, and that they are legal governments because he has thus launched them into being.

On the other hand, on this side of the Chamber, we hold that that proceeding was illegal. Would it not have been rather prudent—certainly it would have been modest—upon the part of Mr. Johnson if he had reflected a moment before launching these governments into being, that the time might come when this Black Republican Congress might lay a heavy hand upon those mushroom States and extinguish, or in the words of the Senator from Indiana, absorb them, and that one consequence of that proceeding (which all will admit to be legal) might be that the United States would charge themselves with all the debts of the Johnson governments? Sir, if the President foresaw such a result he was very unwise to attempt the experiment which he undertook; and if the debts which have been created already by these States during the Johnson régime there amount to one hundred millions, the country, according to the doctrine of the President of the United States in this message, will see the dangers into which he and his advisers have carelessly and recklessly run the Government of the United States.

But sir, I deny any such liability on the part of the United States, whatever their Government may see fit to do with the Johnson governments. I look upon those governments now, as I always have done, as being without law, as resting not on the foundation of law, but the capricious will of the Executive of the United States, who, under the Constitution, had no authority to establish them or to take the first step toward their establishment. Whoever, therefore, has assumed to contract with these Johnson governments, has done so with his eyes open; and if he has become a creditor of these States, and it shall turn out that in law and justice they were no States having the faculty to enter into contracts and obligations, he has but to thank himself for his own folly; and if he is in the end a loser he has nobody to complain of except himself, and to regret his own indiscretion.

But even that is not the case, as I hold. These are governments de facto, existing, not of law, not by the sanction of law, but existing simply in fact. The people of these respective States have submitted to them; they have submitted to the authority of these usurped governments; and for all purposes of public law, according to my judgment, the people of those States will still carry these obligations, if there are any such, upon their shoulders, until they fully discharge them as States. If they were so unwise as to submit to the illegal proclamations of the President of the United States, to attempt to reorganize their governments in that way, they must submit to the consequences. And this I hold to be public law, applicable to the people of those States as well as all other people, so that after Congress has acted and these States are reconstructed, formally and properly readmitted to their privileges in this Union, if there be any such old debts accruing under the Johnson governments it will be for the people of those States to take such course in regard to them as they themselves shall see fit.

I make no further comment upon the gratuitous introduction into this message of language on the part of the Executive which is certainly calculated, if it were not intended, to alarm capitalists and to create a ferment among them throughout the United States, and to throw odium upon this Congress for its attempt to reconstruct fully and properly these States. I think it was very gratuitous and very unkind; I do not think that, in the end, the sensible capitalists of this country who hold that description of securities, if there be any such, will thank Mr. Johnson or his advisers for this gratuitous attempt to impair the credit and the value of their securities.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this message is in perfect keeping with the action of the President during the last two years. He has lost no occasion, public or private, to talk about "the bonded aristocracy;" to hint to the country that there is to be a great contest over the payment of the debt incurred by the war. The effect of this action on the part of the President tends to impair the credit of the Government. In his conversation with General Halpine, published to the country months ago, we had the arguments in support of the hints that he is so accustomed to make whenever he can get anybody to listen to him. The suggestion is made in this message for the purpose of bringing odium on Congress, of making the impression that the public debt is in danger, of alarming those who hold the public debt, and perhaps those who hold debts against these States. Those who hold the public debt need have no anxiety whatever, and those who hold the debts of these States need not have any. The reason is very plain. The policy of Congress has a tendency to strengthen the national debt and the debts of those States. Why, and how? We have established by law a plan by which these States can be restored to their practical relations, can come back again into these Halls. It is now clear to the comprehension of men of intelligence that the friends of the Union, the friends of the united country, the friends of equal liberty, the men who are in favor of education, in favor of diversified industries, in favor of developing the natural resources of those States, are coming into power there, and they will demand the payment of their own debts and the payment of the national debt. By their legislation and policy they will enable these States to start afresh in a career of prosperity, increasing their own power and means to pay their debts and their securities will increase in value. I have not the shadow of a doubt that the policy of Congress adds to the value of the national debt, and adds to the value of the debts of these States.

That policy tends to the prosperity of these States; and all of them, with the exception of Texas, will pass into the control of men who condemn the policy of the President, who condemn the policy of those who sympathize with him. These States, sir, will pass into the hands of men true to the country, true to the rights of man, men who are in favor of developing and increasing the power of these States, and of strengthening the whole country. We shall have in a few months from this time, in the election in Virginia, evidence of this which will satisfy Mr. Johnson and Mr. Johnson's friends. All the hints, messages, and conversations of the President, whether with editors in this country, or with correspondents of papers in England, will not affect the national debt, nor the debts of any of these States; and the holders of both need give themselves no anxiety on account of any hints, messages, or talks of the President. All these suggestions, therefore, will not come back upon Congress, will not affect the national credit, nor the credit of any of these States. We need give ourselves no anxiety about the effect of the message upon the country politically or financially.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I regret that the President of the United States has, by the message just read, disturbed, or assumed to disturb, public confidence in the national debt; and I am glad that from no State, no party, no Senator here does the message receive any favorable response. It finds no sympathy in the Senate of the United States.

The message is calculated to do great injury; not that the intelligence of the country will be disturbed by it, but unprincipled speculators can and will use it to play upon the fears of the uninformed, and thus prey upon their property. Holders of our securities abroad may be affected by it.

The suggestions of the message are entirely groundless. If it be true that a conquering nation that absorbs the government found existing and institutes one of its own in its place thereby assumes the debt of the country conquered, yet the debt contracted by the conquered country in carrying on the resistance to the conquering nation is not thus assumed. Even this message does not suggest the absurdity that the United States may become liable for the debt of the rebel States contracted during the war; it is the debt of States existing at the time and prior to the war to which the message makes allusion.

And how, I ask, can the United States, even on the law and principles relative to conquest, become liable for the States' debts existing at the time of the war? The United States have not set aside those governments and instituted the Government of the United States in their stead. The governments which the United States have superseded and declared illegal are the governments without authority organized by the Executive. Congress finding the functions of government not lawfully in force in the rebel States properly undertakes to reconstruct the States. This is not conquest, and the principles incident to conquest do not apply.

But besides, sir, the doctrine of conquest is not in any view the proper one to invoke on this question. The fundamental law of the nation declares "That the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of this land," of every rood and acre of it. The rebel States refused to obey the laws of the United States, and the United States compelled them to obey. They rebelled and we put down the rebellion. We suppressed the insurrection. This is not making a conquest. It is maintaining our own Government according to the terms of a Constitution binding on all parties. The rebel States thus by their rebellion forfeited certain of their rights, and Congress have declared those rights forfeited. They did the acts of forfeiture, and we recognize it as a forfeiture. The very existence of the nation required that this forfeiture should be declared and recognized. We could not permit our open enemies to rule us in our councils.

I respectfully insist that the doctrine of conquest and its incidents are not applicable to the relations existing between the Federal and the State governments.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I suppose it to be an advantage to have this message in print so as to be able to command its contents before we proceed to discuss it thoroughly and exhaustively. I confess I did not hear the whole of it read, and I observed that there was not general attention in the Senate during its reading. If, however, I were to judge by the speeches delivered subsequently, I should suppose that no document ever commanded such profound attention, or was so completely understood by the members of the Senate as this is. I suspect that when gentlemen outside of our Chamber who have not the privilege of hearing documents read, but who wish to read and ponder them for themselves, come to examine this message it will come to pass that they will take a somewhat different view of it from that which has been taken by the Senator from New Jersey and others who have spoken. I think, sir, it will come to be understood from thorough examination of the document itself, and not of the speeches that have been made concerning it, that the President of the United States is not in favor of the assumption by this Government of any portion of the State indebtedness of the southern country, whether it existed before the war or was incurred by irregular and disloyal governments during the progress of the war. I think it will be understood that he is simply putting an argument to show the fallacy, the unsoundness of that policy in the government of this country to which he is opposed, that he is simply suggesting that upon the theory and upon the doctrines which prevail with gentlemen to whom he is opposed politically these consequences would legitimately follow.

Now, it seems to be admitted also in this Chamber that if the existing condition of things in the southern country should continue, if there should not be a change, such results might be predicated upon that condition of things; in other words, if you establish military governments there, if you declare them superior to all civil authority, if the power to pass laws of taxation and to form contracts there is subject to the military authority of the United States entirely and exclusively, and continue that condition of things for some time, the creditors of those States could come to you, this obligation would be cast upon you legitimately and properly, because there would be no civil government in any one of these States that could respond to a public creditor. Therefore, sir, the argument against the President's suggestion, and the only argument, is that your policy, your system in that country is to come to an end, that it is to terminate, that a regular civil authority established by the people themselves is to come into being. Then, you think, according to the argument, it follows that you will escape the suggestion which the President has made.

Well, sir, whether it was worth while to have this point raised and debated or not is perhaps not very material. Perhaps we do not differ upon principles. Perhaps we agree more nearly than we supposed, all of us, with the principles laid down by the President of the United States. Some persons have the opinion that you intend to continue your existing system for a considerable time. You assert that you intend to bring it to a conclusion speedily. I think upon both sides of this great debate the conclusion we shall come to and must come to is that the sooner we terminate the authority of the United States in that country, the sooner self-government reasserts its prerogative in that section, the better at least for the creditors of these southern governments and the better for the Treasury of the United States.

However, sir, I did not intend to enter into this debate. I rose for the purpose of suggesting that we have arrived at that period of the day when it would be convenient to adjourn, and I submit that motion, unless there be some reason for withholding it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I desire to give a notice if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Very well. I do not make the motion at present.

Mr. THAYER. This hypothetical opinion of the President is so clearly presented that I think the Senator from Pennsylvania with his usual sagacity will not be long in arriving at a condemnation. I have read it carefully in order to understand it. It is in these words: he says that the expenditures "would be largely increased if the United States by abolishing the existing State governments should become responsible for liabilities incurred by them before the war in laudable efforts to develop their resources." He has not the boldness to assert the opinion that the United States, by abolishing these State governments, becomes responsible; but he resorts to an insidious effort to create a suspicion in the public mind that the Government of the United States, by declaring these State governments to be illegal, does assume these obligations created before the war. It is in my judgment another attempt, by insidious means, to throw an obstacle in the way of the work of reconstruction, or, in other words, to throw a new disturbing element into the national politics of this country, to lead the public mind to inquire whether we do not become responsible for these debts; and in my judgment it is the duty of the Senate, it is due to the country, to treat it in that manner which shows that the Senate, at least, regards it with the utmost indifference.

Now, sir, I should like to ask any one who indorses this opinion or intimation of the President, who was responsible for the payment of these debts when the acting President of the United States created State governments in the revolted States? If those governments which were created by his order are responsible for them, then of course the governments which will be created under the reconstruction acts of Congress will be responsible for them. We, by declaring the mode and manner in which these State governments shall be formed and created, subject to our approval, provide for the organization of legal State governments; and if the obligation exists to pay these debts honestly contracted—and I hold that the obligation does exist—those governments which follow will have the obligation resting upon them to pay these debts, and not the Government of the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall have the question on printing the message.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that, and I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that this message lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MALINDA HARMON.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I have uniformly voted against every proposition to open up subjects of legislation; but inasmuch as the rule has been departed from to-day in favor of deserters, I now give notice that to-morrow I shall ask a mitigation of the rule adopted by the Senate for the purpose of taking up Senate bills No. 127 and No. 128.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now renew my motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to introduce a bill on the subject of our Indian affairs for the purpose of having it printed so that the Senate can see it to-morrow morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes; which was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, July 15, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference to the appropriate committees, not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, beginning with the State of New Hampshire.

The Speaker proceeded with the call.

DECISIONS OF MILITARY COURTS.

Mr. KELLEY introduced a joint resolution relative to the decisions of military courts; which was read, as follows:

Joint resolution relative to the decisions of military courts.

Be it resolved, &c., That decisions of military courts or commissions made in civil causes in the States lately in rebellion, at times when no civil courts were in operation in the said rebellious States or any of them, shall be held valid and binding.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in regard to the judges of the Supreme Court and other courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill to make legal-tender notes receivable for duties on imports; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

Mr. NOELL. I desire now to call up a resolution offered on Saturday, and which was then objected to.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Was the resolution in reference to legal-tender notes referred to the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. It was, because no other motion was made in regard to it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was referred, with a view of referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the joint resolution was then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HARBOR AT STRAIGHT CUT, WISCONSIN.

Mr. PAINE presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking an appropriation to the city of Milwaukee to reimburse to it the expense of constructing a harbor at Straight Cut; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE WILLIAMSON AND COMPANY.

Mr. PAINE also introduced a joint resolution to refund to George Williamson & Co., of Milwaukee, certain duties paid upon pig iron; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

MRS. HELEN L. GASS.

Mr. PILE introduced a bill for the relief of Mrs. Helen L. Gass; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Pensions when appointed.

REGISTRY, ETC., OF CERTAIN VESSELS.

Mr. CHURCHILL introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of registry or enrollment and license to certain vessels; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, (at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

On the motion, there were, on a division—ayes sixty-two.

Before the negative votes had been counted, Mr. WOODBRIDGE withdrew the motion. Mr. FARNSWORTH. I renew the motion.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks consent to state to the House that it has been discovered that in enrolling the supplementary reconstruction bill two or three words were omitted. The President of the United States has stated to the Clerk that he has no objections to the bill being withdrawn, that it may be properly re-enrolled and submitted to him again to-day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In view of this statement I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand that it is alleged that there was a mistake made in the enrollment of the reconstruction bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that two or three words were omitted.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire what were the words omitted?

The SPEAKER. They were in respect to appointments by military commanders.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to inquire whether there is any necessity that the House should remain in session for the purpose of correcting the enrollment?

The SPEAKER. The House must decide that question for itself. The Chair will submit the question.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will it be necessary for the Speaker to re-sign the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question, and the House can decide the matter for itself.

In the haste with which on last Saturday this bill was enrolled from the report of the committee of conference that part of the section in regard to appointment and removal from office by military commanders, which states that the appointments shall stand until they are disapproved by the General of the Army, has been omitted. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the President, whom he has seen to-day, is willing that the bill may be withdrawn and those words inserted. It is for the House to decide whether the legality of the bill would be affected if the words were inserted without any new action on the part of the House. The question is, whether the House shall now adjourn and allow the Clerk, as the enrolling officer of the House, to make this correction, or whether the bill shall be again enrolled and signed by the Presiding Officers. It is a question of such importance that the Chair will not attempt to decide it.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I hope we shall not adjourn. We had better be on the safe side.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If there is any doubt on this question I will not press the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the responsibility of interrupting the business of the morning hour, this being a matter of very great importance—more importance probably than any business of the morning hour. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is recognized.

Mr. BANKS. If there has been an error in the enrollment of the bill I think it due to the importance of the question with reference to the two Houses of Congress that the bill should be re-enrolled, and that the signatures of the Presiding Officers should be affixed to it anew. This will present the question in the proper light, and relieve us from any possibility of embarrassment hereafter. I hope this course will be pursued. I move, therefore, that the Clerk be directed to request from the President the return of the bill, that it may be re-enrolled.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. ROBERTSON introduced a bill to reimburse the State of New York for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning volunteer forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

INVESTIGATION OF THE REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by this House with power to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer to examine into the working of the detective system of the internal revenue department, into the seizure of spirits and tobacco made by persons other than those designated in the acts of Congress, and to examine into the disposal of spirits and other goods, wares and merchandise seized or sold by order of the courts, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that if the resolution be adopted I do not wish to be placed on it as chairman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It then goes over under the rules.

TAXATION OF UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. SELYE submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That in the opinion of Congress no further issue of the bonds of the United States ought to be made for any purpose not already provided for except upon the distinct condition that they shall be subject to taxation for State, county, and municipal expenses in the same manner and to the same extent as other property is now or may hereafter be assessed.

FORFEITURE OF SOUTHERN SWAMP GRANTS.

Mr. JULIAN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the forfeiture to the United States of the swamp land heretofore granted to States lately in rebellion which have not been lawfully disposed of by said States.

TAXATION OF UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the bonds and other securities issued by the United States, which by law are exempt from State and municipal taxation, ought to be taxed by the authority of Congress for national purposes, in such manner and to such extent as may be necessary to substantially equalize taxation, taking into consideration the average tax imposed on other property for local purposes in the several States, such bonds and other securities not being exempt by any provision of law from such taxation; and that the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed, be instructed to report a bill providing for such equalization of taxation.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. PRICE. I rise to debate the resolution. The resolution, under the rules, accordingly went over.

REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House whether he has established, or caused to be constituted, in the city of New York, an association or commission of officers or persons known as the "Metropolitan Board of Revenue," or a commission or organization in that city in any way connected with the revenue service by any other name or style; and if so, that he state under what authority or under what provision of law and with what object or for what purpose such a board has been created, what individuals compose it, when, by whom, and under what authority they were selected or appointed, what powers they exercise, what instructions have been given to them, and what have been up to this time their acts or proceedings, collectively or as members of such a board, in relation to revenue matters; and also that the said Secretary furnish, with his reply hereto, copies of all correspondence that the Treasury Department or Revenue Bureau have had with officer or person in relation to the establishing of said board or its proceedings, including all letters, orders, decisions, accounts, communications, or writings of any character on record or file in the Treasury Department or in any bureau thereof having relation to or connection with said so-called "Metropolitan Board of Revenue" or any other such commission in the said city of New York.

The SPEAKER. This being a call on one of the executive Departments for information requires unanimous consent to be now considered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object, as it is the same as my resolution.

Objection being made, the resolution under the rules went over.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. COVODE submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the Judiciary Committee on the subject of the impeachment of the President of the United States be printed, and that any portion of said committee be allowed to report thereon at any time.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 41, noes 36; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. COVODE.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 59.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, rose to debate the resolution, and it accordingly went over.

SUPERINTENDING INSPECTOR OF STREETS, ETC.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a bill to abolish the office of superintending inspector of streets and carriage ways in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia when appointed.

KENTUCKY, MARYLAND, AND DELAWARE.

Mr. KELSEY offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby instructed to inquire and report to this House whether the States of Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware now have State governments republican in form, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suggest that the State of Maryland is already embraced in a resolution referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 33, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. KELSEY and ELDRIDGE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 47.

The Chair voted in the affirmative; so the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was disagreed to.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the mover of this resolution to accept an amendment to include the State of New Hampshire.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NOELL. I ask the gentleman to include the State of Missouri.

Mr. KELSEY. I decline to allow any amendment.

On agreeing to the resolution there were—ayes 61, noes 40.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 39, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Gravelly, Halsey, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClure, Mercer, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Starkweather, Aaron T. Stevens, Taylor, Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Blair, Burr, Chanler, Cobb, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Ferry, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Jencks, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Marvin, Mungen, Noell, Phelps, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Smith, Stone, Taffe, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, and Windom—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broome, Calk, Sidney Clarke, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kitchen, Lafin, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Niblack, Nicholson, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Wyck, Wood, and Woodbridge—54.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BEAMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. Urson, had been called away by the death of his father.

Mr. MORGAN. Had I not been paired I would vote no.

Mr. KELSEY. My colleague, Mr. LINCOLN, is absent on account of sickness, as I have just learned by a telegram.

The result having been declared as above recorded.

Mr. KELSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Ela, on account of serious illness in his family.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. RANDALL offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

40TH CONG. 1ST SESS.—No. 42.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House no national bank should be selected as a public depository of Government moneys in any city or place where there is located the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States, but all public moneys collected and received in any such city or place for the Government should be deposited with such Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to transfer any moneys now in such national banks to said Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States at the earliest day practicable.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think this had better lay over for debate.

The SPEAKER. The previous question will arrest debate.

Mr. PILE. I suggest that it be a joint resolution. The Secretary of the Treasury is not amenable to this House alone.

Mr. RANDALL. It is merely a request.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to—ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAM FROM GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. JUDD introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War have leave to withdraw from the files of the House a private telegram from General Sheridan to General Grant, dated 22d of June, the same having been communicated to this House by mistake.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the question of the impeachment of the President of the United States, and that the testimony already taken by said committee be printed for the use of this House.

The question was taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 29, noes 66.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. PIKE. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution goes over under the rules.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, as the morning hour has not yet expired.

SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. BROMWELL. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas certain swamp lands have heretofore been granted by the United States to the several States in which they lie, and said lands, or some portion of them, were afterward disposed of by the United States by permitting military bounty land warrants to be located on the same, and in lieu thereof warrants have been issued to such States which in some cases are of no value to such States, for the reason that the public lands in such States have been sold by the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands, when appointed, be and are hereby instructed to inquire into and report to this House the expediency of providing by law for the issuance of land warrants to such States, to be located on any of the public lands of the United States, in lieu of the lands so disposed of by the Government, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JULIAN. Let me state that this question has been repeatedly before the Committee on the Public Lands, and that they have uniformly reported adversely. I have no objection, however, to the resolution.

The question was taken on the resolution, and it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the House take a recess until three o'clock p. m.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Before the gentleman presses that motion, will he allow me to offer a resolution, to which I think there will be no objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to move as an amendment to his motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday?

Mr. PIKE. I waive my motion for a moment.

RECEPTION OF "LOYAL" CONGRESSMEN.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it has been alleged in one of the loyal papers of the State of Ohio, that the expenses in a large part remain unpaid for the wines and liquors, &c., furnished at the reception given to the loyal part of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the same should in the opinion of this House be at once paid out of the fund raised for evangelizing the colored race now in the hands of the Republican executive committee.

Several members objected.

ROCK ISLAND RAILROAD BRIDGE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Congress of the United States did by act approved June 27, 1866, authorize the Secretary of War to change the location of the Rock Island railroad bridge, and to grant pecuniary aid or otherwise toward effecting said change to the railroad companies using said bridge; and whereas by an act approved March 2, 1867, an appropriation of $200,000 was made toward the building of a new bridge, which should not seriously obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi river; and whereas said appropriation was on condition that the Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company should first agree to pay and should secure to be paid one half the cost of said bridge; and whereas said company has utterly failed to notice either of said acts, or to enter into any agreement for the change of the location of their present bridge, which bridge is believed to be a great obstruction to the free navigation of the Mississippi river and a public nuisance: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to institute legal proceedings in some court of competent jurisdiction for the removal of said bridge, and the abatement of the same as a public nuisance, provided said company shall not within three months from the date of the passage of this resolution comply with the terms of the acts before named.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How does that resolution come in?

The SPEAKER. It is not yet before the House. The Chair was about to ask if there was any objection to it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made unless the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] withdraws his motion for a recess.

Mr. PIKE. I insist on my motion for a recess until three o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not my motion pending?

The SPEAKER. A motion contemplating a recess in the day's session cannot be so amended. If it be voted down, then the gentleman's motion can be made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not understand correctly the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I supposed that it related to another matter. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COOK. I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a message requesting the return of the reconstruction bill has been sent to the President; and the bill may be returned during the recess. If there be no objection, it will be understood as the sense of the House that the Speaker shall receive any message which may be sent by the President during the recess. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion of Mr. PIKE was agreed to; and the House (at one o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) took a recess till three o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

APPROPRIATION FOR RECONSTRUCTION.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In lines four and five strike out the words "six hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars," so that the clause will read: "for the purpose of carrying into effect the above-named acts there be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1,000,000."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know precisely the reason for this amendment; but there can be no doubt that the reduced appropriation proposed by the Senate will be sufficient for all the purposes contemplated until the next session of Congress. I therefore move that the House concur in the amendment; and on this motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

SUPPLEMENTAL RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly reënrolled an act (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867; which, agreeably to the request of the House, had been returned by the President for the correction of an error in the enrollment.

MILITARY FLOGGING OF A CIVILIAN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 3d instant, a report from the General of the Army relative to the alleged flogging of a civilian at Fort Sedgwick by order of Colonel Dodge.

Mr. HOLMAN. As that communication is brief I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, July 13, 1867.

Sir: In relation to the resolution of the House of Representatives of July 3, respecting the flogging of a civilian by order of Colonel Dodge, at Fort Sedgwick, I have the honor to state that there being no information in the Department on the subject, the resolution was referred to General Grant, by whom the following report has been made:

"No official information of the flogging of a civilian at Fort Sedgwick has been received at these headquarters. On the 28th June, 1867, a newspaper slip containing an account of the affair was sent to General Augur, commanding department of the Platte, indorsed as follows:

"Respectfully referred to General Augur for investigation. If the newspaper statement is found correct, General Augur will order the trial by general court-martial of the offender; otherwise the statement will be contradicted."

"Immediately on its receipt, the report of General Augur will be transmitted to the Secretary of War."

U. S. GRANT, General.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States; when the Speaker signed the same.

INDIAN WAR.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill amendatory to the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes, and to make a brief explanation of the purpose sought to be accomplished.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported to the House before any action is taken upon it.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not yet before the House.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is to repeal the following clause of an act approved March 29, 1867:

"And all laws allowing the President, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into treaties with any Indian tribes are hereby repealed, and no expense shall be hereafter incurred in negotiating a treaty with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such expense shall be first made by law."

I desire to repeal this clause of the act and to state my reasons for it. I have reliable authority for saying that the chief of the Army has made the statement that we are now expending in this Indian war $1,000,000 per week, and that we have in the field about six thousand men. Now, sir, if this war is to be continued, as it is now being waged, until the next session of Congress, I venture the assertion that we will be called upon next December to appropriate at least $50,000,000 to pay its cost. At the same time that a war of this magnitude is being waged we have upon our statute-books a law which prohibits anybody making a treaty of peace under any circumstances whatever. No matter if every hostile Indian upon the Plains shall come in and ask to lay down their arms and abide by the terms that we may dictate, I believe under this law that no one has a right to treat with them, and we are to continue expending money at the rate of $1,000,000 per week.

Mr. Speaker, if we were to expend more than that perhaps the Government could stand this luxury for a year or two; but General Sherman, on the 17th of June, 1867, writes from Fort McPherson, Nebraska, to the Secretary of War as follows:

"My opinion is if fifty Indians are allowed to remain between the Arkansas and the Platte we will have to guard every stage station, every train, and all railroad working parties; in other words, fifty hostile Indians will checkmate three thousand soldiers."

He was deemed insane in the early part of the war for saying that it would require two hundred thousand troops to hold Kentucky in the Union, but it was afterward proved he was correct.

I believe, sir, that he is right in this estimate, and that fifty hostile Indians upon the Plains will hold in check three thousand soldiers. That being the case, those now hostile can put into the field three thousand warriors; and if General Sherman is correct, in order to conquer those three thousand warriors we will have to put into the field one hundred and eighty thousand men. But perhaps that is an exaggeration.

The Comanches and their affiliated tribes will soon be compelled to join the hostile bands, for though a portion of them are anxious to make peace there is no one authorized to treat with them. I will be more moderate, and say that it will require before the war is ended fifty thousand soldiers; and I firmly believe, sir, that twice fifty thousand soldiers cannot subdue them.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman to state to the House in what condition, by the taking away of all treaty-making power, the country is now left? I ask him whether the present great difficulty does not arise altogether from the taking away of that treaty-making power with these Indians from the proper Department?

Mr. WINDOM. I believe so, and have just so stated. I have endeavored in my opening remarks to state the condition of the country so far as these hostile Indians are concerned. I repeat, sir, that no one is authorized to treat with them; and I was about saying that fifty thousand troops would be hardly sufficient to conquer them.

Now, if it requires one million per week at present to carry on the war with six thousand soldiers in the field—and we shall soon require fifty thousand, which is a moderate estimate of the probable cost; I ask gentlemen to look at the figures for themselves: seven millions per week or one million per day will be required before the end of the next six months to carry on this most unnecessary war.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman if he proposes to bring forward at this time any earnest proposition for peace with these Indians. It seems to me a war waged without the intention of bringing peace is an absurdity, unless you propose to annihilate the Indian tribes. And all legislation upon this subject will have the effect merely to put money into the hands of contractors. I do not believe the gentlemen having charge of this measure means anything but what is wise and right; but I ask him if the proposition now before the House is intended to bring about peace with the Indian tribes?

Mr. WINDOM. The proposition I have made is simply to remove an obstacle in making peace. The gentleman, I apprehend, did not hear my opening remarks.

Mr. CHANLER. I was not in the House at the beginning; the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. WINDOM. We passed a bill during the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress declaring that nobody should have any power to make peace with the Indian tribes. I want merely to remove that obstruction, so that if a condition of affairs shall transpire whereby peace can be made we shall have power in somebody's hands to make it. I have not to-day any definite plan of peace prepared, because I suppose the House would not act upon any such measure at this time. But I do desire to place in the hands of somebody the power to make peace, if it is possible, without expending money after this fashion.

Sir, I firmly believe this whole Indian war might have been avoided in the first place. I will not now go into that question, though I would like to do so. I will only say I think its origin was in the massacre of the Cheyennes at Sand Creek by Colonel Chivington. There the war commenced, and from that most atrocious act it has grown to its present proportions. The Indians were further aroused during the last session of Congress when General Sherman issued an order that any Indian found within certain boundaries, between the Platte and Missouri rivers, without a written pass from a military officer should be summarily dealt with; that is to say, shot.

Now, the Indians who occupied that territory had a right, by treaty stipulation with this Government, to hunt on that very territory; but your military commander issued a proclamation that if any of them were found hunting there they should be shot. Delegations from all these tribes were here in this city and in these galleries last winter, and remained here for a month. They heard this military order of General Sherman, and considered it a proclamation of war against every Indian on the Plains, and they are now uniting against us to resist this declaration of war.

Another thing: General Sherman at the same time issued an order to which I once before called the attention of the House, and which, on account of its unequalled atrocity, I desire again to repeat. It was in these words:

"We must act with vindictive earnestness against the Sioux, even to their extermination, men, women, and children. Nothing else will reach the root of the case."

The Indians know that the commanding general of your Army in the West coolly proposes to murder their wives and little children, and they are in open resistance to that order. Are they not justifiable in resisting it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand to what general the gentleman alluded when he read that remarkable passage called a general order or proclamation.

Mr. WINDOM. To General Sherman.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to an inquiry?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I agree with the gentleman in reference to this question, if I understand his proposition aright. I think whenever a great nation prosecutes a war there should be some competent power authorized at all times and at every step to make peace. But I wish to inquire where the gentleman proposes to vest the power to make peace with the Indians.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the President has always exercised the power to do it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman expect he can procure from this House authority for the present Executive to do anything of that sort? Does he think the majority of this House will trust the present Executive with any such power, either in the interest of humanity or of constitutional government?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not introduce this bill as a political question. I think it rises above politics. All I desire to say is that it leaves the question where it was before we passed the act referred to at the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It places the power where it has hitherto been, and leaves somebody authorized to treat and make peace, if peace be possible. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE.]

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word upon this subject, as I believe that I am the only member of the House who has been out upon the Plains looking after the matter during this summer. I was with General Sherman in the valley of the Platte at a time when families who had been driven from their ranches came to him and asked that the Government should pay a reward for Indian scalps. At North Platte there were several hundred men there, and General Sherman attempted to talk to them, but they did not want to listen to him; he told them that the Government would not pay for scalps, and endeavored to allay their bloodthirsty feeling by reasoning with them, but it was all in vain. I have seen the difficulties with which General Sherman has been surrounded, that it would require a large number of troops to protect the scattered population of the Territories, that it would require almost a regiment to protect each family. General Sherman told them that the only security he saw for them was for them to concentrate themselves, as the Government would not be able to protect them in their present isolated positions.

Now, sir, in regard to what is best to be done—and as the gentleman from Minnesota says, this question is one far above political questions—I do not see, after having examined the matter thoroughly for a considerable length of time, any daylight unless we can accomplish something by treating with these Indians; and I would say, as I said to the Secretary of War the other day, that we must have a different class of men to treat with the Indians, or a different class of men to fight with them, if fight them we must. I believe that a large majority of the agents appointed go out to plunder the Indians; and I know that when the Indians descended into the valley of the Platte and drove away a large amount of stock the soldiers sent after them did not want to follow and fight the Indians. There is not a sufficient number of troops out there to follow and fight all the Indians when they come to be collected together. We do not know where, if ever, we are going to meet the united forces of the hostile Indians; and if we are going to fight with them we must have a largely increased army. I listened to the plea made by a portion of the Indian tribes now on the war path. They claim that the country between the Platte and the Arkansas was assigned to them as a hunting-ground, but that we have come there to build railroads and establish settlements, thus driving away the buffaloes; and while they admit that there is no use in their trying to fight us, they say distinctly that they may as well be killed in war as starved to death. These are the statements of the peaceable portions of the tribes now upon the war path, and it is impossible for us to wage war against those tribes when our own people have been the aggressors.

There are such difficulties surrounding the question that it is almost impossible to decide what is best to be done. My opinion is, that if the Government would send out men to them who would neither steal nor murder, we might withdraw our army. You may send out five times as many troops as you have yet done, but you cannot thereby prevent murders such as have occurred in the frontier settlements and upon those engaged in constructing the great Pacific railroads. The Indians know where our troops are and they do not go there, but they destroy life, capture property, and drive off stock at points where they know we have no troops. I know that it is utterly useless to expect the regular troops to follow and punish the Indians, and recapture the stolen property. If you want to fight the Indians, you must employ frontier men, who will follow them. The troops of the regular Army will not do that; they will only follow them out of sight, in obedience to the orders of their superiors.

I said to General Sherman that there cannot possibly be any glory for him in such a war, and the sooner it is off his hands the better.

I take occasion now to say that it is yet within the power of the Government to treat with those Indians and induce them to lay down their arms. But this must be accomplished through the medium of men who understand the Indian character, men who are worthy of confidence. If men be sent there as a reward for party services or political infidelity, they endeavor to steal all they can from the Indians, as they know they can hold their positions for only a brief period. Hence they seek to make fortunes while they have the chance.

Mr. Speaker, the cheapest solution to these troubles is in the prompt construction of the Union Pacific railroad to the Pacific ocean. As it now presses on toward the Rocky mountains it drives the frontier ahead and dispenses with the use of forts and troops, while it affords the emigrants a base along which they can settle and form their own defenses for the future, as the Indian makes war only upon isolated settlers and gives the iron horse a wide margin. The expense of keeping one regiment on the Plains for a year will build a hundred miles of railroad. Let the Government aid the Pacific railroads by indorsing their bonds liberally, for they will settle this question more rapidly and more certainly than any means I have yet been able to discover.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] obtained consent to make a brief statement. The Chair thinks the time allowed is exhausted, unless the House extends it. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill entitled "An act amendatory of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes."

The bill, which was read for information, provides for the repeal of the following clause of the sixth section of the act named in the title:

"And all laws allowing the President, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into treaties with any Indian tribes are hereby repealed, and no expense shall hereafter be incurred in negotiating a treaty with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such expense shall be first made by law."

There being no objection, the bill was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WINDOM. I call the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. WINDOM. I will do so.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of expressing the hope that this bill will be passed, not because I think it is in principle the best measure that we could devise, but because I think it the best that can be adopted in the existing juncture of affairs. There is now no power to arrest this Indian war by treaty. I would give such power, and if possible arrest it. It is a war that can do our country no good nor add any glory to our arms, while it may disgrace us. It can only be arrested by treaty, and I am in favor of thus bringing it to a close.

I rise also to throw out an idea which I hope will meet the concurrence of members generally, that our whole system of dealing with the Indians ought to be changed, and to express the hope that at the next session such a change will be consummated. Our present system of treating with the Indians as tribes, maintaining foreign nations in our midst, is a system by which the Government and the Indians are swindled and wars created. Were we to deal with the Indians as families and as individuals—were we to extend to them the benefits of the homestead law, and disburse no more money than we now spend in annuities in furnishing seeds, implements, and stock to those who would adopt the pursuits of agriculture—we should find that many thousands of our Indians could be made good citizens, and would become protectors of our railroads, interested in our carrying trade, and be gradually absorbed in our community.

My object is accomplished in bringing this idea to the attention of the House and avowing the purpose at the commencement of the next session to propose such modification of our Indian system as shall reject the idea of the existence of tribes and nations, and bringing the influence of the Government to bear on individuals and families.

Mr. WINDOM demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. I think we will accomplish nothing by meeting here to-morrow.

The House divided; and there were—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. LAWRENCE of Ohio were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 45.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 63, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Barnes, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Driggs, Eldridge, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Hamilton, Holman, Assael W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Kerr, Koontz, Lonn, Marshall, Marvin, Mercer, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Noel, Phelps, Polsley, Randall, Robinson, Sawyer, Stone, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Ward, and Henry D. Washburn—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Churchill, Cobb, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Ferriss, Ferry, Finney, Hill, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Logan, McClurg, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Raum, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Caldwell, C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Blaine, Brooks, Bromhall, Butler, Calk, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fox, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Ketcham, Kitchen, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Morrell, Morrissey, Nicholson, Orth, Peters, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Schenck, Selye, Shellenbarger, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Tafe, Upson, Van Trump, Van Wyck, and Wood—57.

So the motion was disagreed to.

KENTUCKY, MARYLAND, AND DELAWARE.

Mr. ARCHER and Mr. PHELPS stated that if they had been present when the vote was taken on Mr. KELSEY's resolution they would have voted in the negative, and that they would favor the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred when it came up.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, asked that the motion to adjourn be withdrawn until he could submit a bill for paying mileage for this session.

Mr. SCOFIELD declined to yield.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rules, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of W. D. Pear-sall, of Kewansville, North Carolina, asking for restoration to full rights of citizenship.

By Mr. BANKS: The memorial of James M. Sandige, of Louisiana, for the removal of political disabilities imposed upon him and his father, Garrett L. Sandige, seventy-seven years of age, a soldier of the late war with Great Britain, by the several acts of Congress for the reconstruction of government in the rebel States.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of citizens of the fourth ward of the city of Washington, praying Congress to strike from the city charter the property qualification and the word white, so that there shall be no distinction on account of color in the qualification for holding office.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 16, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of Daniel Sigler, register of the land office at Natchitoches, Louisiana, praying the passage of a law, whereby the people of that district may reënter the same lands at $1 25 per acre which they entered under the confederate rule at twenty-five cents per acre; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of discharged soldiers, praying for the speedy payment of the bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of Ann Augusta Pinckney, in which she represents that she is the widow of the late Charles Pinckney, for ten years secretary of the United States legation at the court of St. Petersburg, the second son of the late Mr. Pinckney, Senator of the United States and minister at several courts; that she is the mother also of two sons who died from wounds in the war, that she is poor, without means of support, and she asks that Congress take into consideration her circumstances, her sons' and her late husband's, and give her a pension. The case as I understand it is without any precedent. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of D. E. E. Brameau, of the county of Matagorda, in Texas, asking to be reinstated in all his rights as a loyal American citizen under the powers reserved to Congress by the constitutional amendment.

I also offer a similar petition from Samuel S. Houston, of Mobile, Alabama, with accompanying papers and recommendations setting forth his merits as a loyal citizen, asking a restoration to his privileges as an American citizen. I move the reference of these two petitions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a petition of citizens of the fourth ward of Washington, in which they set forth a grievance to which they are exposed under the existing charter of the city of Washington, to the effect that, though there is a large number of colored voters in the city, yet by the terms of the charter colored persons are excluded from holding office. They ask that those words of the charter shall be removed, and they also ask that the property qualification in the charter shall be struck out. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. If it is in order now, I desire to introduce a bill in part to carry out the prayer of the petition which I last presented. I send the bill to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be received and read the first time.

The bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have it read at length. It is only one short section.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which proposes to declare that in the District of Columbia no person shall be excluded from any office by reason of race or color, and to repeal all laws making any such discrimination.

Mr. SUMNER. I would ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that bill now by unanimous consent. I think there can be no objection to it. It is simply to carry out what I believe in the Senate is understood to be the effect of the existing legislation, but which practically does not seem to be its effect. At the late election in the District it was understood that by the existing terms of the charter colored persons could not be qualified as aldermen or as common councilmen or as assessors; and on examining the charter which I have on my desk now, I find that by its terms, strictly construed, it is so—that these offices are confined to free white persons. By our legislation all persons, without distinction of color, can be voters, but nothing is said about their being office-holders. For one I should not doubt that under the Constitution and particularly after the recent legislation, the existing discrimination adverse to colored persons would be void; but practically it is not so regarded; and I submit, therefore, that it is proper in Congress to brush it away. I think there can be no objection to doing so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks unanimous consent to consider this bill now. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no particular objection to the consideration of this bill as a special measure; but I do not see how we can object to any other bill if no objection be made to the introduction of this. I believe I must object.

Mr. SUMNER. I asked unanimous consent. I put it on that ground.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made—

Mr. SUMNER. It is withdrawn, is it not?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I give notice that I shall endeavor to call up the bill to-morrow.

RELIEF OF DESERTERS.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to report back the bill which was referred to them yesterday (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated, with an amendment striking out the preamble, and striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and inserting a substitute. I ask for the consideration of the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill named by him at this time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears no objection. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out the preamble, and also by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the words which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That no soldier or sailor shall be taken or held to be a deserter from the Army or Navy who faithfully served according to his enlistment until the 19th day of April, 1865, and who without proper authority or leave first obtained, did quit his command or refuse to serve after said date: but nothing herein contained shall operate as a remission of any forfeiture incurred by any such soldier or sailor of his pay, bounty, pension, or other allowances; but this act shall be construed solely as a removal of any disability such soldier or sailor may have incurred by the loss of his citizenship in consequence of his desertion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the bill that was up was the bill offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] I understand, withdrew his objection, and when it was again asked if there was objection, I thought it was with reference to that bill. As that bill was the line of business here I did not choose to make an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the bill which was yesterday referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. As soon as this bill is out of the way I will call mine up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is this bill printed?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. We propose to strike out the whole of the long bill that came from the House and insert a brief section which is very clear and plain. I hope the Secretary will read it again.

Mr. POMEROY. Why is the date of April 19, 1865, fixed?

Mr. WILSON. Because that date was in the House bill, and that is the date of the surrender of Johnston's army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am not, and was not at the time, in favor of the punishment of stripping a party of his citizenship of the country because he may have deserted from the service; and I offer an amendment, as an additional section to the bill, to repeal that provision of law in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That section twenty-one of an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is that section?

Mr. HENDRICKS. A section that found its way most unnaturally into one of the laws providing for the draft, filling up the armies. It is in this language:

"That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States; or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof; and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service, and all persons who, being duly enrolled, shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled, or go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section. And the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of this section, in which proclamation the President is requested to notify all deserters returning within sixty days as aforesaid that they shall be pardoned on condition of returning to their regiments and companies or to such other organizations as they may be assigned to, until they shall have served for a period of time equal to their original term of enlistment."

I think that section ought to be repealed. The purpose of it was to secure the efficient execution of the law authorizing the draft. It was a provision for the exigencies of the service during the war; now that peace has come I do not think it ought to continue. Practically there have been troubles under this law. In the State of Indiana the constitution says that citizens of the United States and persons who have declared their intention to become citizens shall be voters. The question has never gone to the courts, or to the supreme court at least, in that State, as it has in the State of Pennsylvania, whether this penalty can attach prior to a conviction. To my own mind it is very clear that no penalty for a crime can attach until the guilt of the party has been ascertained as required by law. It would seem to me that the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania was very clearly right upon that question. But some of the election boards hold that it may be inquired into by them; and in a most unsatisfactory way, without the possibility of trying the question properly, they examine whether a man has been a deserter, and pass upon it. Anybody will see that that is unsatisfactory and ought not to be the case. Where the party has been convicted, and there is a record of the fact, there is no difficulty about it. Where there has been no proceeding it is a very unsatisfactory examination, as every one will admit, and it ought not to be thus left. The War Department leaves it permanently in that position. The War Department has decided to prosecute no person since the return of peace for desertion. The necessities of the service do not require it; the peace and quiet of the country do not require it; and therefore they prosecute nobody. On one occasion I applied to the Department for the pardon of a person who had left the service under excusable circumstances, as I thought. The reply made was that a pardon was not necessary, that the Department did not contemplate the prosecution of anybody; therefore it was in reality useless to trouble them on the subject. On that ground it was declined.

As the Department having charge of this sort of questions has decided that it is not good policy to press to conviction those men who during the war left the service, I think Congress ought not to leave a statute which brings up troublesome and unnecessary questions in the country.

Mr. President, I never was so impressed with the kindness of heart of President Lincoln as upon one occasion when I applied to him to relieve from the penalties of a conviction a young man from my State who had been found guilty of desertion under circumstances that appealed to the kindness as well as to the justice of the Executive. He said to me that his interference by the pardon of deserters was a subject of a good deal of embarrassment to him; that if he pardoned them the commanders said to him that he was disturbing the service; but, said he, "I know how this is. Young fellows who have lived at home all their lives under the excitement of the times go into the Army; they do not understand much of its hardships, do not appreciate the step they are taking; they go into the service, and after they are away from home a little while they become homesick, and they, not thinking of the disregard of duty, start off home;" and, said he, "whenever there comes to my knowledge any such case as that I do not allow them to be shot." He pointed me to where he had in a pigeon-hole a very large number of sentences that he held up, and he said he was not going to allow the sentences to be executed, but would leave them for the time being in that condition as an admonition to others as well as themselves, detaining them in the service with their position as it then was until he could act without embarrassment to the service. Nothing that he ever said to me impressed me more favorably toward him as a man and as an officer than that conversation. And, sir, in the spirit of that conversation I submit the amendment that is now presented. I know of cases in which parties left the service, even before the close of the war, under circumstances that would appeal, if the question ever came to a trial, very strongly to the sympathies and to the sense of justice of any court or of any Executive.

But the reason mainly, Mr. President, why I offer this amendment is, that I think a statute which causes embarrassment in the country, and is not required any longer as the War Department has decided by refusing to prosecute anybody under it, ought not longer to stand on the statute-book. The service is not embarrassed by its repeal; no wrong is done. The war is now over. There is no need of having any class of people in our midst stripped of their citizenship. We have been adding these two years very largely to the citizenship of the country, and it is not necessary that this section, which places a large number of people in an uncertain condition in the eyes of the law, shall longer continue, and I think a provision repealing it may well be added to this bill. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say that it does not prevent the punishment of desertion under the Articles of War; it leaves it to be punished just as it was punished prior to the act of 1865. That act simply strips them of their citizenship, and that is what I propose to repeal. The law was passed March 3, 1865, just at the close of the war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Indiana please read the section that it is proposed to repeal?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose no one will claim that this ought to have a retrospective effect. It was at the close of the war, but a month before the surrender, the 3d of March, and yet it does reach to some persons. The section is:

"That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost-marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof; and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service, and all persons who, being duly enrolled, shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled, or to go beyond the limits of the United States, with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section."

I submit to Senators that the latter provision could not be enforced in a military court, as I think a party before he is drafted is not a soldier; and if he goes away to avoid a draft the punishment must be enforced in the civil courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has not the Supreme Court decided the other way in a case from Pennsylvania some years ago?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think they have.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that point the supreme court of Pennsylvania decided that a man was not to be held a deserter unless he was convicted as such.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Supreme Court of the United States have held that such men might be tried by a military tribunal on the ground that they were in the military service, and they could therefore if they were in the military service commit a military crime.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Men who were not drafted at all?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where they had been enrolled and escaped in order to avoid being called upon to perform military service.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The language of the law is "who being duly enrolled shall depart the jurisdiction." This law was passed, as I said, shortly before the close of the war. It has not a very general operation, I suppose. I do not know what number of cases would come within its provisions; perhaps not a very large number. The desertions that took place were really most of them during the earlier part of the war, as I understand, perhaps in 1861, 1862, and 1863.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they covered by it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. They would not be covered by it, of course, because they mainly returned to the service before that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it would operate prospectively upon them, giving them sixty days to return.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But let me submit the facts to the Senator: this law was passed on the 3d of March, 1865; then some time after that I believe there was a proclamation issued; I am not sure whether the President did issue the proclamation pursuant to this law or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That would bring it to the latter part of March or the first of April, and then the proclamation allowing sixty days, they would be called upon to return after the close of the war. This bill itself relieves parties who actually deserted from the ranks after the close of the war. This provision would operate only upon those that did not return after the close of the war. There was no injury in that, no wrong in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be no great danger in their returning then.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There are just two classes that this section operates upon, it having been passed just immediately before the close of the war, first, those who did not return under the proclamation of the President. I wish I knew the exact time when that proclamation was issued; but it must have been some time after the passage of the law, and they were called upon to return within sixty days, so that their return would be after peace had come, at least after the surrender, after the time mentioned in the bill that is now upon the table. That class comes within the principle, and all the others would be such as may have deserted from the 3d of March up to the close of the war. I do not propose to relieve them from all penalties, as this bill does the others, but I simply propose to relieve them from the loss of their citizenship. Does any Senator believe it is better to keep in this country any class of men stripped of citizenship? It has not been the doctrine of the Senate in regard to another race. I have not agreed with the majority on that question, for reasons, however, that do not apply here; but a very broad sentiment has extended over an entire race because it was held that it was better that the people living in this country should be citizens. Now, as there are so few that this law can operate upon, and as it is a mischievous question, and the Courts have not yet decided upon it, I think we had better repeal it.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the Senator from Indiana understands that his proposition does not relieve these men from desertion and all the responsibilities of desertion. They are deserters still.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. It simply relieves them from the loss of citizenship.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They are liable to every punishment for desertion, to every disability, and every loss except that. If this section be repealed, they will not be stripped of citizenship.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is entirely true that it does not relieve them from the penalties of desertion; but we understand perfectly, as has been stated by some Senator, that the idea of punishing a man for desertion in the late war is entirely gone by; the prosecutions have been discontinued; the Department does not think it worth while to undertake to go over the hundreds and thousands of cases of men who, disaffected toward their country, and sympathizing with the rebellion, have either deserted from the ranks after they got into them, or ran away to avoid being brought in at all. When there were thousands of such disloyal and unpatriotic citizens—I hope very few in Indiana, which is a gallant State, but perhaps some, from the interest my friend takes in it—Congress declared to these persons, "If you will return within sixty days, your previous offenses shall be forgiven; we will have a species of military amnesty extending to a certain limited extent, if you will come back to the service of your country; we give you time to repent and to reconsider of this greatest crime that a citizen can commit against his country next to actual treason, and that is a cowardly and disloyal refusal to fight and peril his life in her defense." Very well. Now, within the sixty days many did return, undoubtedly, especially as thirty of the sixty days were when there was no further personal danger, the war being over. I think we may take it, therefore, that all returned who had any special sentiment which might be supposed to animate the breast of a citizen to show some respect to his duty toward his country.

Now, then, there are still left out under the prohibition of this act a certain other class, who, having set their duty as citizens at defiance, having betrayed their fellow-soldiers by leaving them, as Irishmen say, "in the gap," and running away from the field or having run away to avoid the draft—all that class of persons refusing the clemency of the Government and still staying away and not coming forward, are simply deprived of the right to exercise the political privilege of citizenship. I take it they may still sue in the courts, because aliens can do that.

If a respectable foreigner comes into the country who is not a citizen, while we receive him we do not allow him to become a citizen until he shall have resided five years in the country; and he must not only have resided five years in the country, but during all that time he must have led a virtuous and patriotic life. That is required also. He must not show sympathy with the enemies of the country; he must not undertake to evade the responsibilities that fall upon a denizen as well as a citizen; and when he shall have complied with that provision we receive him into citizenship.

Now my friend from Indiana says that it is a hard case, indeed—hard, I take it, toward the millions of men who actually stood up to their duty—that these deserters and cowards and runaways, half traitors, should have been kept out of the privilege of voting for him or for me for a period of more than two years. It is now two years since the war closed. I think they can afford to wait the other three, to say the least of it.

Besides, this amendment has no cognate relation to the bill itself, as my friend from Indiana supposes. The bill proceeds upon the hypothesis that it is to operate only upon a class of men who honestly and in good faith, but with a mistaken view of their rights, after having fought through to the close, went home without leave, which at the most would be a mere technical desertion. I do not think it would be that. This amendment proposes to restore to their political privileges as citizens a body of men who, so far as we know, have no excuse whatever for their refusal to do their duty to their country. That is the distinction.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I recollect very well the occasion when this law was passed. I remember that a division was not called upon it, that there was a general acquiescence in its enactment, although there were some doubts, and very grave doubts, about the authority of Congress to enact a law disfranchising any portion of the citizens of this country, and to do it upon a conviction by a military tribunal. It was then regarded, however, as a useful measure in order to induce persons who were derelict to return to the Army. The leading and controlling motive, I think, as then stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, was to induce those men to return, to get men to fill up the ranks and to carry on the struggle in which we were then engaged. It was intended as a measure of intimidation to meet the exigencies and necessities of the time, and there was not very particular attention paid to the question of our power to disfranchise citizens of the United States, nor to the propriety of the unusual and very extreme punishment provided by the law.

I know that that was my view. Although I had grave doubts about this legislation, I sat quiet and acquiesced in it, because I supposed it would be but temporary in its duration, and that it would meet the requirement of that occasion in bringing back to the Army men who had departed from it under circumstances of varied character, and bring men in who had not responded to the draft. But, sir, I then looked forward to the conclusion of the war and to our repeal of the law when the necessities which brought it into existence no longer pressed upon the counsels of the Government. That time has arrived.

Now, let me call the attention of the Senate, for a short time, to some considerations which, in my judgment, appeal to them with imperative force in favor of the repeal of this act of 1865. By a prior law all cases of desertion were to be heard before courts-martial, and in case of the draft persons who were found or arrested by the military authorities were to be sent at once for trial to the nearest post; their cases were to be heard by courts-martial and the judgment of the law pronounced. That was the mode of trial provided by the law, and it attached to this enactment of 1865, and covered all cases which might arise under it.

Now, sir, there are no such tribunals organized. There are no trials going on in the country, and have not been for two years. There was a general order of the War Department suspending all proceedings by the military authorities in cases of this kind. What is the consequence? Here you have your enrollment lists as they were made up in the different districts in the country; they are in existence, and they show an enormous number of names of men who are alleged to be deserters, and there is no mode of trying them, no mode of investigating their cases. It is perfectly well known that probably half the names upon those lists are there incorrectly. They are either blunders of the enrollment boards, or they are cases of men who had some legal excuse, who could have made a legal defense if they had been called upon at the proper time to respond to the demand of the Government upon them. Why, sir, there are thousands of cases upon those rolls of this character; cases of men who were drawn in the draft, and who did not respond for one reason and another, and who are recorded as having failed in their duty to the Government, and yet they were men who were drawn in subsequent drafts and actually went into the service, or they were men who enlisted and served in the Army, or they were men who went as substitutes, and thus rendered equal service to the Government. A very large percentage of these deserters' lists are made up of the names of men who actually performed service for the Government under one or the other of the circumstances which I have mentioned.

Now, sir, I need not go over a great variety of other cases which existed where the party, if he had been called upon at the proper time, could have made defense under some provision of the existing law. I know one case of a man fresh from the Pennsylvania State Lunatic Asylum, who was reported upon one of these lists; no notice was served upon him or anybody else; he was carried off and tried before a military tribunal at Harrisburg, and put in a prison, and under the sentence passed upon him he was loaded down with a ball and chain—an insane man. The case was heard rapidly, summarily; nobody appeared for him; the court did not know that he was insane; they asked him some questions; he gave some absurd replies, and they supposed he was an incorrigible offender. It was necessary to appeal to the President in that case and have the man pardoned, in order to discharge him from his prison and from bonds.

The cases of error in these lists and the cases where there was a legal defense of the party at the time are innumerable; but the Government provides no mode by which these lists may be investigated, by which they may be purged of error and injustice, and by which the rights of the citizen may be maintained—his legal and reasonable rights. A man who did not respond to the draft, or a man whose name is incorrectly upon these lists cannot have his case heard; he cannot organize a military tribunal to hear it, he cannot make his defense. There he stands condemned so far as that record is concerned, and with no opportunity of trial; he cannot even go to the President and get a pardon, although he may have a meritorious case, because there is no conviction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why under this state of hardship has not my friend from Pennsylvania before this time brought forward a measure which should relieve the innocent, while it still left the guilty to suffer the consequences of their crimes?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, sir, if I brought forward a measure providing courts for the trial of all these cases through the country, the Senator from Vermont and other members of the Senate might have occasion to laugh in my face at the idea of expending the enormous amount of money that would be necessary to effect the object in view. The Government cannot undertake that business. The War Department made a very proper order after the war was over and the necessities of the public service had passed by, and when it would have been extremely unreasonable and extremely oppressive upon the Treasury to proceed with an investigation of these cases; the Department acted very reasonably in issuing this order, under the authority of the President.

Now, sir, as the whole country knows the complication of cases upon these lists, the infinite variety of them, the known fact that a large percentage of them, perhaps a majority of them, are cases where the Government would have no case if there was an actual hearing, and considering also the fact that there is no mode provided for the trial and examination of these cases, and no redress even to the party by appeal to the President of the United States for a pardon, you have a clear case made out for the repeal of the act of 1865, especially in view of the argument already made by the Senator from Indiana, that all the usual punishments provided by law for desertion would still continue in full force.

The bill itself brings to our attention a class of very interesting cases from the State of Ohio, and possibly from other States, and the merit of the proposition contained in the bill cannot be disputed; and yet in point of law, in point of technical law, perhaps, that class of cases is one to which punishment should be applied much more than to some others not covered by the bill. There seems to be no question that in point of law a large number of persons did desert after the war was over. Why do you repeal the law as to them? Because as to them the law is not now founded upon public policy; it is good policy to withdraw this peculiar statute, passed under peculiar circumstances, and allow the ordinary laws that prevail in relation to desertions in the Army of the United States to resume their operation.

Mr. POMEROY. I am ready to accept the substitute which the committee have reported as being better than nothing, and perhaps it will answer the purpose. I felt particularly interested in this matter, because to my own State there came a large number of regiments in 1865 to fight the Indians. They came there from Ohio, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, and other States. They were sent out there after their term of enlistment, as they claimed, was ended. They had fought, as they thought, through the war for which they enlisted. It was after the surrender of Lee and Johnston; then they were sent out to the borders of Kansas to fight the Indians. They said that they did not enlist for that; that that was not the war they had agreed to engage in; and the whole thing was so distasteful to them, they felt so little interest in it, that many of them left the Army and settled in my State. Thousands of them are there to-day—a great many, at any rate. We are not very particular in Kansas in regard to voting, because our suffrage law is quite liberal; but at the same time there is a cloud hanging over these men who are said to have deserted that I want to have uplifted. It is sometimes said of them that they are not citizens, that they have been denaturalized. I confess that many of them I have found to be very good men, laboring honestly and faithfully, building up the State, adhering to our institutions, and I should feel gratified, as thousands of others would be, if that cloud were uplifted from these men, who are technically deserters.

But there is another class who will be reached by this amendment that I do not think are so worthy of commiseration. I had the fortune or misfortune to be at Chicago in 1864 at the convention that nominated McClellan; and after the convention was over, I found the cars on the road to Canada filled with American citizens, or men who had been American citizens, going to Canada. Some of them had been over to attend the convention, and I remember the discussions which were had—they were earnest and severe—in the cars. I told those men that if they ran to Canada under such circumstances to avoid the draft they ought to be British subjects, and I would never agree that they should be American citizens again until they had been naturalized here like other British subjects, and staid five years and took the oath of allegiance. A man who left his responsibilities on this side, at such a crisis in the history of the country as that was, and dodged over the other side of the line, adhering to the men there who were our enemies, rebels, should not now be dealt with mercifully by legislation. I am not disposed to extend any peculiar favor to such men; and if this amendment of the Senator from Indiana is looking in that direction I shall vote against it. I do not propose to alleviate the condition of those who ran away from their responsibilities at such a time as the Government was then passing through. I do not think that even five years of probation would bleach out their crime. It is but a little behind treason itself for a man to avoid taking a part with his country on the right side.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope there will be no amendment made to the bill as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. The subject was there well considered and maturely reflected upon, and I think what the committee have prepared is better calculated to suit the circumstances than anything the Senate might agree to in the hurry and confusion of business here. As the bill is reported by the committee it applies only to those who left the service after the war was really over, when there was no necessity for their services. That is not the case with those who would be excused by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, as I understand. That would excuse a large number of men in my State, men who left the service while the war was in progress, men who left after they were drafted, and men who ran away before the draft was made. Probably there were many of that class of people in my State who ran off to Canada, and I have no doubt their number is sufficient to change the result of the election this fall. I am not in favor of extending the right of suffrage to men who by their acts would have destroyed the Government during its struggle, and especially do I not want anything passed now which would interfere with the interests of the elections in Pennsylvania, if you choose; I have no concealments. Every honest patriotic man who served his country is entitled to vote, and will be allowed to vote, and every traitorous rascal who ran off when the country needed his services will be excluded if we can exclude him, and I am sorry to say that there were many of that kind of men in our State. I think it but fair that men who served during the whole war, and until they were no longer actually needed, should be excused; and perhaps after awhile we shall become more liberal and extend the same rights and the same pardon to men whose offense is much greater, but I am not in favor of doing it at present.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, there are other privileges of United States citizenship besides the right of suffrage which has been alluded to. If a citizen goes abroad from this country he is entitled to a passport from the Department of State, and carries his nationality with him wherever he goes, over the face of the earth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most of these went abroad during the war without any passport.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Under certain statutes citizenship is a requisite to the bringing of suits in the United States courts for the protection of property. I think it was under one of these statutes that the celebrated decision from Missouri in regard to negro citizenship was made by the Supreme Court. And in many other respects this question of citizenship is one of transcendent interest and importance.

Now, sir, I do not understand that this question is material in my State. I understand that under the law as pronounced there by the highest judicial tribunal, as well as by a number of the courts of common pleas in the several districts, and by Republican judges as well as those of the opposite party, this question does not possess practical importance as a question of suffrage. But in other aspects it is interesting, and it may be more important in other sections of the country.

I understand also that under your act of Congress there is no disfranchisement of any human being in the United States from the right of suffrage; that that must be the act of the State itself, either by its constitution or by State law passed in pursuance of its constitution. It is therefore perfectly feasible, it is a thing eligible and possible, for any State that pleases, by fundamental provisions to disfranchise persons of this class, to make her electoral system exclude them from this right. You cannot do it. All you can do is what you did in 1865, to pass an act of intimidation for the immediate necessities of the public service, by which you make proclamation that you will withdraw United States citizenship and withhold such privileges as pertain to United States citizenship under your laws, and that you will inflict upon the individual whatever of disgrace, whatever of ignominy is attached to his coming within the purview of your law.

But, sir, so long as that law remains on the statute-book, what is it? It is an element of disturbance; it is an element of dispute; it is an element of unpleasantness in the country. It is a thing upon which there is unnecessary and fruitless but vexatious debate. After you repeal this law, after you withdraw it, now that the reasons for its enactment no longer exist, every individual that was or is within its provisions remains accountable to public opinion, accountable among his neighbors for his former conduct, and he must suffer their censure and ill opinion as long as he lives, and perhaps his family after him. This takes place without your law; and whatever there be of retribution and of punishment and of justice to these persons from the reproaches of neighbor and enemy, they will suffer. I suppose this may be considered adequate punishment for simply withholding themselves from the public service when they ought not. It is a very different offense from a deliberate desertion of the flag after the soldier is in the public service, after he has been sworn in, and has been marched to the field of conflict. It is a very different thing when he plays the traitor, not only to his country, but to his associates who are about him; when he imperils their lives and imperils the success of the public cause by his conduct. That is a crime of a very different description from this one of avoiding a public duty to the community, whether it be instigated by cowardice or by any other influence or circumstance which may operate on the human mind.

I think, sir, that the repeal of this law will be wholesome in its effects; that it will promote the public interests; that no reason exists for continuing it on our statute-books; and that those who desire that these persons should continue to be punished hereafter, can be fully gratified by there being brought to bear upon them that social ostracism and that disapprobation of their fellow-citizens which their conduct is calculated to provoke. This moral punishment will attend upon them long after your law is repealed, and is an appropriate substitute for the extraordinary, injudicious, and unreasonable penalties, additional to former ones, contained in the act of 1865.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise only to correct what seems to be an error on the part of my colleague. He says there must be a law of the State before you can punish these men. Why, sir, we had a law in Pennsylvania carrying out the law of Congress, and yet the supreme court, which happened by some particular organization to have the power against the country, decided that that law was unconstitutional or illegal somehow. No man in Pennsylvania who was with the country during the war believes that that decision of the supreme court was right or that it will stand when a new judge shall have been put upon that bench, who will probably go there next fall.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to interrupt my colleague and to remind him that the decision to which he refers was pronounced by Judge Strong, who has been an ardent and active member of the gentleman's own party.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only to say in reply that Judge Strong is one of the best men on the bench anywhere; but Judge Strong was a Democrat up to the time of the war, and he had a little too much of his Democracy left to enable him to disagree with Judge Woodward, who was the leading judge upon that bench.

Now, as to the public opinion of which my colleague speaks, that is very well in some places, but it does not amount to much in the case of deserters up in his county or the adjoining county, where the majority is so large on the Democratic side, and was so large against the war. It did not hurt a man there to be a deserter, and they ran off in crowds. I do not want those people to come back this fall and vote. As I said before, perhaps after a while we shall forgive them, after we have forgotten how many men have been destroyed by their desertion and by their bad conduct; but for the present I think it is going far enough to relieve from disfranchisement those men who remained in the service until the war was over, until they were really no longer needed—men who fought, and many of whom were wounded in battle.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is taken I wish to say one or two words in reply to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I do not propose to discuss the political questions which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] has referred to, how this may affect the votes of particular sections of the country. Although the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday would allow the suspicion that there was some political purpose to be accomplished in some locality or other by this bill that is upon the table, yet I choose to consider this subject upon its honest merits; and in that light and in that alone I propose to answer in a word or two, if I can, the argument of the Senator from Vermont.

He is an able lawyer, as is known to us all; and I submit to that distinguished Senator and able lawyer whether a penalty described in a statute can attach to a party before conviction. When the law itself requires an investigation before a tribunal established by the law, and that investigation has never been had, do any of the penalties prescribed as a punishment for the crime attach to the party before he is convicted? I think the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania is clearly right. I do not care what is the language of a penal statute, the guilt of a party cannot be collaterally inquired into, nor can punishment be inflicted under any proceeding of that sort.

Suppose, as in the State of Indiana, disfranchisement is a part of the punishment for some crime, no lawyer ever supposed that an election board could inquire whether a party proposing to vote was guilty of larceny or guilty of arson, and upon the finding of the fact against him, when there had been no investigation in court, say that he stood disfranchised because he had done acts which produced disfranchisement? The consequences of the act are to be found by a court, and until that be done there is no punishment.

So, sir, practically under the law, in my judgment, this section has no bearing in the country; at least not in my State; but it has come up as a troublesome question. In one case, for instance, the members of an election board have been sued because they rejected a vote under this law. We ought not to have a statute thus standing that does no good and produces simply confusion.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I should like to suggest to him with a view to the particular argument which he makes, whether after all the difficulty is not one of the form of legislation, supposing his general proposition to be correct. Now, suppose a State Legislature prescribes as a qualification for every voter that he shall take an oath, which oath among other things shall be to the effect that he has never deserted the service of the United States; so far as the objection which he now makes is concerned, does the Senator say that it would not be competent for an election board clothed with the power to administer that oath to insist upon it and to exclude a man that could not take it? If so, then it follows, so far from this statute being nugatory, except as applied to those men who have been convicted, it is applicable to every man in the form of an oath. Whether for other reasons such an oath would be competent or not is a question which I do not suggest, because the Senator has not done so. There are other suggestions which I think apply to it; but I do submit to him in answer to his argument that there is a practical form of legislation by which a mode could be devised equally efficacious with conviction in order to ascertain and punish by practical disfranchisement the guilt of which disfranchisement is the punishment in whole or in part; so that it will not do to dismiss the statute by saying it cannot be effectual in the States except upon those who have been convicted by a military tribunal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The answer to the Senator from New York is, as I think, a very clear one. The party is not disfranchised in the case he mentions because of this statute. This statute does not define the crime of desertion. This statute does not create the offense of desertion, and the disfranchisement in the case which he mentions is not because the party comes within the provisions of this statute. The case that he mentions may have occurred long before this statute was enacted. The deserter may be liable to punishment under other laws and not liable to punishment under this law at all, and yet he cannot take the oath that is mentioned by the Senator. The party in the case that the Senator mentions is disfranchised because he cannot take a particular oath, just as a party cannot take his seat in the Senate here unless he can take the iron-clad oath. The State sees fit to exclude from the privilege of voting all who cannot take a prescribed oath. It is the act of the State; and if this section were repealed I ask the Senator whether the party could still take the oath. Suppose you repealed all laws punishing desertion, could a party who had deserted still take the oath?

Mr. CONKLING. I will answer. Such a provision in a State statute is predicated on this very statute. Why? Because no State can pass an ex post facto law. Desertion from the armies of the United States is no offense against the laws of the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania; but when by law, whether upon conviction or otherwise, a State undertakes to inflict pains and penalties—because disfranchisement is a pain and a penalty—upon a man for doing an act which was no offense against any law when he did it, and which was at no time an offense against the law of the State which denounced it, that State is passing first an ex post facto law, and second a law which is void by another provision of the Constitution of the United States. Therefore, if it can be done at all, it is to be done as auxiliary to this very statute which the Senator is discussing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Because the Congress of the United States sees fit to punish an offense in a particular way, can a State law, an ex post facto law, punish an act committed before it was passed?

Mr. CONKLING. That is another question which I alluded to a few moments ago, which I said had not been suggested by the Senator from Indiana. That question I know is in the minds of the bar and the bench. How that may be is another thing; but my statement was that if it could be done at all it could be done in theory of this law, and that this law was an essential ingredient in the operation of doing it by any mode short of fundamental provisions put into the constitution of the State. Now, whether it can be done at all or not is a question which I hope the Senator will not invite me to discuss. I do not intend to enter into it here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As I think, this law gives the State no power. This is simply an additional punishment, leaving the crime of desertion as it was defined before, with all the prior punishments upon it, adding simply the punishment of loss of citizenship. Now, the case that the Senator mentions is a case where a State, not for the purpose of punishment, but for the purpose of prescribing the qualifications of an elector, says that nobody shall be an elector unless he can take the oath which the Senator states.

Mr. President, I am very clearly of the opinion that an election board cannot exclude the vote of any man unless upon a record of conviction. An election board cannot enforce this law against any party unless he has been first convicted. I say that in answer to what seemed to be the view of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The Senator from Vermont, departing from the legal question, has appealed to what he supposes, I presume, to be a prejudice in the Senate, and has spoken of the cowards and the traitors who may have deserted from the Army. He has spoken of all deserters as cowards and traitors. Mr. President, to my own knowledge that is not so. I know of a case of a very dear friend of mine who was a private soldier and fought bravely in the southwestern army. He was, however, addicted to the habit of intemperance, and when that army came to a large city he fell under the influence of his habit; and in that state and condition he left the lines, went to his home and continued on his spree for some time. Although his friends urged his return at once, he thought he would return in time and all would be right; but when he came to his sober senses he dared not return, he was afraid to return, and instead of returning to that regiment, he enlisted in another regiment, and until the close of the war was a soldier in the service. He carried the banner at Fredericksburg, at Gettysburg, and through the Wilderness, and was captured at Cold Harbor, and was a prisoner for eight months in the southern prisons. That flag was riddled, and his regiment came out of Fredericksburg, where it went in with a full thousand, with less than three hundred; and at Gettysburg, after it had been filled up, it came out again with less than half its numbers. That soldier never faltered in the Southwest or in any of the terrible battles to which I have referred; and yet because of his folly he stands recorded as a deserter, but furnishing to the Government as valuable service as any man that went into the Army. I say that in reply to the Senator's general charge of cowardice against everybody who may have deserted. Sitting here in the Senate and sitting in our comfortable homes we do not know the many influences that may have induced a young man to desert; and I do not think that the broad charge of treason or cowardice should be brought against them as a class. I have done my duty on this question, Mr. President. This law reaches to but a few.

One other point made by the Senator I must refer to. He says they had the opportunity of returning. This law was passed on the 3d of March, 1865. The President's proclamation was issued after that time. Sixty days were given them for returning. Before the expiration of sixty days, perhaps before the expiration of thirty days, the war was substantially at an end. Lee surrendered, and many of the regiments were discharged from service before the time limited for the return expired. I leave the question with the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All this story about the particular dear friend of my friend from Indiana is very fine; it is very moving; but my friend has forgotten to tell us and the country of his dear ten thousand other friends who, instead of going South from Indiana, went North or staid at home. They are the men that this law is to operate upon in general, instead of the one dear companion whose story has been told. Now, it is a fact of public notoriety in this country that thousands of the citizens of Indiana having the political views, I will not say of my friend, because I believe he was a patriot, but having political views in favor of the right of secession and opposed to the right of the country, determined that by force or by fraud they would escape from their duty as citizens and either aid the other side or avoid aiding their own. Am I right or wrong? My friend from Indiana does not reply.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose the Senator wanted a reply just now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will very cheerfully give it, sir. The Senator is very much misinformed; there was no ten thousand men from Indiana that went North; nothing like it. A very few may have gone North; a very few compared with the number of men who volunteered and that were drafted, and that entered the Army as substitutes. But allow me to correct the Senator. The section we are speaking of now touches none of that class. This section was passed in March; the draft under this bill was but commenced; it was never completed. The war came to a close on the 3d of March, and in regard to all who avoided the draft it is prospective; it is retrospective only in regard to those who were in the Army. This section has nothing to do with the large class, as he denominates them, to which he refers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, Mr. President; although my friend has evaded the point and gone to discuss the effect of this law, it still appears from his confession that in proportion to the number who are unjustly wronged by this law whom he has described as one man, a friend of his, so far as his knowledge goes, there is a large number who, under one category or the other, are justly obnoxious to the epithets which I applied to them when I was up before; men whom he despised as much as I do; who added to the crime of moral treason—I was about to say the greater crime of meanness and cowardice. We can have some respect for an out-and-out traitor, a man who in accordance with his sincere convictions believes it to be his duty to fight against his country and for his State. You can respect his courage if he fights bravely; you can respect his spirit of Anglo-Saxon persistence if he fights to the end. No man can fail to do it, and we all do it toward the rebels; but a man who in a northern State avoids the draft, or being drafted or enlisting deserts his flag, in my judgment, in a moral sense is a meaner and a worse citizen than the out-and-out traitor.

This is the class of persons of whom I am speaking. I believe there are some even in Indiana. There were some in Vermont; and no soldier of Vermont who returned from the war, and no citizen of Vermont who assisted in carrying on the war, desires to have that class of persons receive as yet any favor at all. The time has not yet come for pardon and reconciliation toward that class. After we have pardoned rebels, fair and square rebels, after we have restored them, as I hope we shall in the fullness of time, to the full exercise of all rights of citizenship, it will be time enough to take up this class of outcasts and traitors and cowards that I have been describing; not the exceptional case that my friend from Indiana speaks of as his friend, because there are exceptions in all these cases, but the great body of those men of whom it was known over the whole country that they were avoiding their duty, and enlisting for the bounty and deserting, running away from the draft and resorting to every means that they could secretly to aid the cause of the enemy and put down our own. They are the class of persons.

Now, my friend from Indiana says the law does not apply to them, that they cannot be made the subject of its condemnation until they are tried and convicted, and he appeals to me whether I do not agree with him. It is not necessary to settle that question now and here. Our judgment would be of no value upon it to the tribunals who will have it to pass upon. It is sufficient to say to my friend that it seems to me to be a quite illogical reason in favor of the repeal of a statute merely to say that the statute cannot operate upon the subject of it until some step is taken pursuant to the law. On that ground my friend would repeal the whole criminal code of the country. You cannot deprive a man who is to suffer a punishment for perjury of any of his rights until he is convicted. Therefore, says my friend, repeal the statute against perjury, because it is of no use until you get the liar and convict him and apply to him the penalty of the law!

Now, let the law stand, and if it turns out that the election boards, the judges of election, in the various States have no rightful authority as a tribunal to apply the law to the subject of it, as I believe they have, then let the courts of the country interfere and apply the remedy. Let us not repeal the law because there are exceptional instances, as there are in every law, in which it may operate hardly. Let us not repeal it because it may not operate upon the body of the offenders until some further step is taken; but let it stand for what it is worth until the country shall have time to see whether it can be applied or not.

Mr. TIPTON. I wish to say a word in regard to one class of soldiers, and that class were a set of as true and honorable soldiers as ever went upon the battle-field, and some of them to-day are deserters. They proved their prowess on your southern battle-fields where they had an open, fair enemy to meet, and always sustained the honor of your country. You sent them on the Plains and you sent an insufficient number of soldiers to protect the Plains. You cut up their regiments that had charged in column against enemies anywhere, and were willing to charge anywhere; you divided them into sections; you placed them in charge of the ranches, the stage-horses, the stations, the property of the Overland Stage Company. You placed these brave men subordinate to semi-rebels in the employment of Ben. Holladay's great monopoly, the Overland Stage Company. They followed the fortunes of the stages, were liable to be shot by the savages from their horses as escorts; were commanded to protect the horses, not the people who lived along the line, but sacredly to take care of the stage-horses of Ben. Holladay's stage line. Their comrades, shot from their horses and from the stages, were only common soldiers of the United States, and they were not to stop to take care of their bodies if thereby a horse was lost, or a stage without passengers liable to be captured! It was the property of a corporation with much body and very little soul, that these brave soldiers upon the Plains were to guard. I have seen them refused the poor privilege of entering the coaches by the subordinates of those who controlled that stage line, at a time when it was next to impossible for them to preserve their lives unless they had the protection of the inside of those coaches.

They became dispirited. They said it was a dishonorable service; they said it was a service in which a brave man had no chance for his life; and temptation came upon them, and some of them deserted. About that same time the war closed; the rebels were fleeing from the State of Missouri to seek a congenial clime in the Territory of Montana, or some other of the mountain Territories. And whenever these brave men were put in command of emigrant trains, they were guarding rebels; they were protecting the property of rebels fleeing from the vengeance of the returned Union soldiers upon the borders of the United States. They heard rebel songs sung in those camps for the first time in their lives, and they found scarcely a ranchman from one end of a line of six hundred miles to the other that was loyal to the country. It was treason everywhere, with which these brave men were identified. They were simply to defend themselves as they could and this property; without being permitted to carry on any offensive war against a cruel, savage foe. And when the bodies of their friends were found before them mutilated as they only could be in savage Indian warfare, and when they found the mutilated bodies of the emigrants along their lines, they had no manhood and no bravery about them if they did not desire to break away from the strict and hard rule of military discipline and defend emigrants along their line as independent volunteers. This was not according to the military law. It was unfortunate that they should have yielded. These were the temptations that often caused these men to step aside from what was really their military duty.

Under these circumstances, therefore, while I will enter no justification for their act, I will say that some brave soldiers, as honorable young men as ever this country relied on in the hour of peril and calamity, did desert; and it is questionable how far they are guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana; and upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 7, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, and Van Winkle—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doollittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the title by striking out the word "volunteer," so as to make it read "An act for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors therein designated."

The amendment was agreed to.

TREATY WITH RUSSIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a copy of a treaty between the United States and His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, the ratifications of which were exchanged in this city on the 20th of June last, providing for a cession of territory to the United States in consideration of the payment of $7,200,000 in gold; and inviting the attention of Congress to the subject of an appropriation for this payment, and also to that of proper legislation for the government and occupation of the territory as a part of the dominion of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that communication and the accompanying treaty be printed and—Several SENATORS. Laid on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it ought to be referred to the appropriate committees for consideration—so much as relates to an appropriation, to the Committee on Appropriations, and so much as relates to an organization of the territory, to the Committee on Territories; and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATY WITH VENEZUELA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of a convention between the United States and the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of that republic, the ratifications of which were exchanged at Caracas on the 10th of April last. As its first article stipulates that the commissioners shall meet within four months from that date, the expediency of passing the usual act for the purpose of carrying the convention into effect will of course engage the attention of Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that message be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, calling for the official correspondence between the Department of State and Hon. L. D. Campbell, late minister to Mexico; and also the correspondence of the Department with his successor; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

CHIEF JUSTICE'S OPINION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the opinion of Chase, Chief Justice, delivered in Raleigh, North Carolina, in June, 1867, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution comes from the Committee on Printing; it has been considered by them; the expense is very trifling—but a few dollars.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 137) amendatory of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to give notice that

I shall to-morrow ask consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill to which the Senator from Pennsylvania objected this morning, further to secure equal rights in the District of Columbia. I hope I shall have unanimous consent for that purpose; but if any objection should be made, I give notice that I shall move to so far suspend the rule of the Senate as to allow that bill to be received.

COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the consent of my friend from Iowa, who withdraws his motion for that purpose, I ask consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That one member of the Senate and two members of the House be added to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, to be appointed by the Presiding Officers of the respective Houses.

I ask unanimous consent to have this resolution considered and passed, because it has been found, on account of the absence of some of the members on the western coast, that the specific duties this committee have to go through with during the vacation cannot be performed without this addition to their number. I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after twenty minutes spent therein the doors were reopened.

MELINDA HARMON.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I yesterday gave notice of my intention to move to suspend the rule of the Senate so far as it would interfere with the consideration of Senate bills No. 127 and No. 128. I will state to the Senate that at the last session a bill was passed for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon, who was executed by the rebels in East Tennessee for having been engaged in bridge burning under orders from our officers. The law, however, is of no use, because the name is described in the bill as Matilda instead of Melinda Harmon. I now propose that those bills be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be interposed the Chair will regard Senate bill No. 127 as before the body.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 127) to repeal an act entitled "An act for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon," approved January 31, 1867, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How does the bill get before the Senate?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. It has been taken up by unanimous consent. It is simply to correct an error that occurred at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does it come from any committee?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. The bill came from a committee at the last session, and this is simply to correct an error in the Christian name of Mrs. Harmon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have that error explained.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. The Senator from Illinois could not have heard me when I was up before. At the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress I introduced a bill for the relief of Mrs. Harmon, leaving the first name blank. It went to the House of Representatives and I furnished my colleague there [Mr. MAYNARD] with the name; but by some mistake the name of Matilda was inserted instead of Melinda. So it turned out that the widow is not provided for at all. That is the error I wish to correct. I have therefore introduced now a bill to repeal that act passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and another bill granting a pension to Melinda Harmon. Melinda Harmon is the widow of Jacob Harmon, who was hung in East Tennessee by the rebels for having been engaged in bridge burning.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why does not the Senator include the whole proposition in one bill?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I might have done it, but I thought it proper to introduce two bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will require a double enrollment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to add the other bill to this.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If we add the other bill the result will be that one section will repeal the law of last year, and the second section will give the right woman the pension.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I care not about the form; but I want Melinda Harmon provided for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be and he is hereby authorized to place the name of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon, on the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 17th day of December, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose it would be more convenient to put the title of the second bill to this. I move that amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the title of the bill was amended to read: A bill for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon.

DEPARTMENT PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a bill on the table from the House of Representatives which is intended to correct an inconvenience that the Treasury Department has been subjected to by what seems to me to be a misconception of the law; but I suppose the Secretary knows how to construe it better than I do. A law was passed at the last session providing that when any printing was to be done other than in the Government Printing Office, the Clerk of the House of Representatives should designate the place where it should be printed—a kind of legislation of which we have had a good deal lately, passing a general law in order to affect the petty patronage of the Departments. The Secretary of the Treasury construes that law so that he is unable to do in his Department the printing that was formerly done there upon the back of bonds and notes and the printing of transfers upon them. It would be manifestly improper that the bonds of the Government should be sent to the Public Printing Office to have the transfers printed on the backs. It can only be done by confidential men and under the supervision of a clerk of the Department in whom all confidence can be placed; and I suppose rather than to have this printing done at the Government Printing Office the Secretary of the Treasury would have the work done by writing, which would be very laborious indeed. They are also in the habit of printing three bands which they put around the bills and the bonds. The paper used in these bands is manufactured from the refuse of the office, the currency that comes back to be destroyed. That is manufactured into paper there, and printed there. I do not see any evil, any abuse that can come from restoring this privilege to the Secretary of the Treasury, if the law has deprived him of it; and if the Senate is willing, I should like to have the bill taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill named by him, which is House bill No. 130, supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the concluding proviso of section ten of the act described in its title shall not be held to prevent the necessary printing, as heretofore done, in connection with the issue, transfer, or assignment of Government bonds or notes, or official envelopes or confidential circulars used in the Executive Departments by their own employes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have an amendment to offer, which has been prepared by the Treasurer. The bill as passed by the other House seems to confirm the construction which the Secretary of the Treasury has put upon the law, and does not allow any printing to be done in the Department, except upon the notes and bonds of the Government. I propose to amend it by striking out the words "in connection with the issue, transfer, or assignment of Government bonds or notes, or official envelopes, or confidential circulars used in the executive department," and in lieu of those words to insert "the Executive Departments and the bureaus thereof;" so as to make the bill read:

That the concluding proviso of section ten of the act described in the title hereof, shall not be held to prevent the necessary printing as heretofore done in the Executive Departments and the bureaus thereof, by their own employes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does that apply to the Internal Revenue Bureau—all the blanks?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is confined to the printing heretofore done in the Departments. The Internal Revenue blanks have all been printed at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is perfectly right that the bonds and transfers and all the printing connected with the issuing of bonds should be done in the Treasury Department. It ought not to be done elsewhere. As a matter of course, the transfers have to be printed in the presence of a clerk. It seems to me, however, that this amendment would now extend to all the printing of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; only to such printing as has heretofore been done in the Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit to the Senator whether it is not enlarging the law further than the occasion demands. The difficulty that the Treasurer complains of is about issuing the transfers of bonds. That must be done in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are a great many labels.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true; but this amendment would extend to anything printed heretofore by the Treasury Department or any bureau thereof. It would extend to the internal revenue office, with the millions of blanks they require. I do not wish the bill to extend beyond the mischief which I admit to exist.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is simply confined to what they have been in the habit of doing in the Departments.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe there has been so much printing done in the Departments as to amount to an abuse. All the Departments during the war, I believe, had their private printing offices, and the compositors were rated as clerks, and they worked but very few hours a day. The work that was done in the Departments in that way must have cost the Government a great deal more than it could have been done for at the Government Printing Office. It was the intention of the joint Committee on Printing at the last session to introduce a bill to prevent all this, but the bill was not perfected. There is some printing that must necessarily be done in the Departments. I am not prepared to offer an amendment that will define exactly how much should be permitted and how much should be prohibited, and I think the better plan is to give to the heads of Departments the discretion they have heretofore had; but still if the Senator from Ohio will move any amendment that will meet his view I shall be disposed to accept it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill read as it stands.

The bill as amended was read.

Mr. ANTHONY. That covers all the printing that has heretofore been done in the Executive Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are going to be here a day or two yet; and I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Printing. I think it is a repeal of the law.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it lie on the table for the present and the Senator can look into it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the bill lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

FACILITATING BOUNTY PAYMENTS.

Mr. WILSON. I presented a petition this morning from some soldiers complaining of the delay in the payment of the additional bounty. At the time we passed the act providing for it it was supposed it would take four years, but at the rate they are going on it will take six or seven years. I desire now to offer a resolution on the subject:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform the Senate whether any means can be adopted by their respective Departments, or either of them, to expedite the payment of the bounties provided for by the act approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can furnish that information to the Senator at once. The only reason is that there is not clerical force enough in the Department to do the business. In the Auditor's office that is charged with the investigation of these bounty cases there is not a force that would begin to do the business, and there are very few clerks of the higher grades allowed there. I had a curious case presented to my notice the other day, which I will relate to the Senate. A constituent of mine who is in the Second Auditor's office, being a young man of more than ordinary capacity and a very faithful clerk, had an offer to be transferred into one of the other Departments and to be promoted two grades. The Auditor would not let him go, and could not let him go. He said that the other bureau might have any number of clerks that he could designate, but they should not be allowed to take out his best clerk, for he could not do the business without him, and he was not able to promote him. So the young man's merit stood in the way of his advancement. The Auditor has not power to promote him and he will not let him go. The result will be that men like him will resign. There should be a larger force allowed in the Auditor's bureau, and he should be allowed to have a larger number of second and third class clerks.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury perhaps may report in favor of that very thing. I should like to have them cooperate and present a plan by which this matter can be closed up in a reasonable time.

By unanimous consent the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

PEACE WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 136, in reference to Indian affairs. Of course the motion is obnoxious to the objection which has been made to other bills on account of the rule, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to consider it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Lieutenant General William T. Sherman, Major General W. S. Hancock, Major General C. C. Auger, Major General John E. Smith, Major General William S. Harney, John B. Sanborn, William Bent, G. P. Beauvais, and Kil Carson be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners on the part of the United States, with power and authority to call together the chiefs and headmen of such bands or tribes of Indians as are now waging war against the United States or committing depredations upon the people thereof, to ascertain the alleged reasons for their acts of hostility, and in their discretion to make and conclude with said bands or tribes such treaty stipulations, subject to the action of the Senate, as may remove all just causes of complaint on their part, and at the same time establish security for person and property along the lines of railroad now being constructed to the Pacific and other thoroughfares of travel to the western Territories, and such as will most likely insure civilization for the Indian and peace and safety for the whites.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners are required to make selection of a district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska, west of the Missouri river, and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, the Little Missouri, and Yellowstone rivers, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains and north of the Platte river and the State of Iowa, in which district there shall be a sufficient quantity of tillable land to enable the said tribes to support themselves by labor. Said territory when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain a permanent home for the Indians located thereon, and no person not connected with said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners are authorized and required to select, as provided in the preceding section, a district of country south of the State of Kansas and west of the State of Arkansas, including the present Indian Territory or such part of it as may be necessary, together with such other adjacent territory as may be thought suitable, to constitute a permanent home for such Indians as now inhabit south of the Platte and east of Arizona, which territory, when so defined and selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall not be entered upon or settled in any manner except by consent of the tribes interested.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, with a view to the ultimate concentration of all the Indians named in sections two and three of this act on the reservations selected, are authorized to make such treaties with tribes now at peace with the United States as will tend to facilitate that object or remove obstructions from the lines of travel aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the following sums of money are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury, to wit: to carry out the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, $150,000; to enable the Secretary of the Interior to subside such friendly Indians as may have separated or may hereafter separate themselves from the hostile bands or tribes and seek the protection of the United States, $300,000.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish transportation, subsistence, and protection to the commissioners herein named during the discharge of their duties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this bill at this time. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri an amendment in section two, to strike out in line two the words "required to make selection of" and to insert the word "examine;" so as to read: "said commissioners are required to examine a district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska," &c.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to discuss this particular amendment, but I rise to ask some explanation of this very important bill from the Senator from Missouri who has reported it. I do not know that I understand the scope and purpose of the bill sprung upon us at this moment of the session. It contemplates, as I understand, a complete change of our Indian policy, and provides for the "concentration," in the language of the bill, of the various Indian tribes upon lands to be selected in or north of Nebraska, for the settlement of a portion of them, and lands to be selected south of Kansas, embracing the Indian Territory, for the permanent settlement of another portion of the Indians. Does the Senator from Missouri suppose that the people in this northern section of the country, and those especially who may be disposed to emigrate in that direction, will be very well satisfied that the country shall be filled up with Indians, occupying what he calls permanent homes? Is it his design that there should be no more acquisition of lands from the Indians, and that they shall occupy and possess these two regions—the one north and the other south of the line of the Pacific railroad—permanently? I should really like some explanation from the Senator from Missouri. As the bill is now framed, I feel very much indisposed to support it; but I ask particularly for an explanation of it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I will state that at a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday morning, a majority, four members, being present, the other three not being in the city, this bill, with the exception of the first section, naming the commissioners, was agreed upon as the result of their deliberations. It is known to us that an Indian war is now being waged. Hostilities are of daily occurrence upon the Plains. I have in my possession a report from General Wright, who started out to survey the line of what is called the Smoky Hill route. He says that he will be compelled to abandon the survey. The fight at Fort Wallace the other day (on the 28th of June) occurred between the escort of his party and the Cheyenne Indians; a fight in which some fifty or sixty men were engaged on each side; a fair fight in the open Plains, in which our men got whipped. He says that the Indians are better mounted than our men; that it is idle to talk about making a survey through that section of country under present circumstances; that they are just as well armed as our men; that they have carbines and ammunitions equal to ours; that they fight with as much spirit as our men; that they are decidedly better mounted, as I have said; and a very great advantage they have is that they are better horsemen and their horses are better trained; and another great advantage which he suggests is that they use the bow and arrow, which our men cannot use, and in close conflict he says it is superior as a weapon for horsemen, far superior to the carbine.

Now we are attempting to construct across the Plains two railroads. With these facts before us it is useless to pretend that these railroads can be constructed. General Sherman in his report says that fifty of these Indians can checkmate three thousand of our soldiers. It is unnecessary for me to go into the history of this Indian war—I have the notes of it before me—because there are but two tribes of any great extent that are engaged in hostilities against the United States; I mean the Sioux or Dakota Indians, as they are sometimes called, and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes united together.

It is useless for me to say who is in fault. I shall not pretend to enter into that discussion, for the reason that it will not facilitate the passage of this measure or any other measure to bring about peace. We know the fact that unless these hostilities are suppressed, and suddenly suppressed, a very large expenditure will be forced upon us. Our treasury is in no condition to meet it. We need to husband our resources, and if we can make peace with the Indians we had better do it. This war, if it lasts during the summer and fall, will cost us $100,000,000. I know that Senators will hear this statement with some degree of unbelief; but I state what I believe, and what will occur in point of fact in a very short time, and all Senators will be satisfied that what I say is correct. We are expending from $125,000 to $250,000, perhaps, daily in this war, and these expenditures will be rapidly increased from day to day, because our friends here from the border now will offer an amendment to this bill—whether the Senate will adopt it or not I cannot say—providing for calling out a large number of volunteers for additional protection, such protection as they say the regular Army cannot give. They want border men called out, men who understand Indian character and understand best how to fight them. How many regiments will be called out? Perhaps four, five, six, seven, or eight regiments. If four regiments are called out, it will be but a short time until General Sherman will be compelled to call out others, and the State authorities will be compelled to offer to General Sherman or other commanders other volunteers in order to protect the frontiers. The war is but begun, and it will increase, and alarmingly increase, in its proportions of atrocity and also in its proportions of public debt. Now, it behooves the Congress of the United States in session to do something, if we possibly can, to put an end to it.

Now, what is the proposition before us? It is very plain and simple. I propose that a joint commission of military men, who have been engaged in this war, and who understand the condition of affairs, and certain eminent civilians, to whom I shall propose to add the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, be appointed; and that that commission shall undertake, if possible, to make peace. Here are the Cheyennes at war against us. Why? We made a treaty with the Cheyennes in 1851, after the discovery of the gold mines in California, in which they obligated themselves to let our emigrants pass over their lands. It will be remembered that the Cheyennes once owned all the mines of Colorado, even up to 1851. Under the treaty of 1825 we did not pretend to say that we had any rights there. Under the treaty of 1825 we said the Cheyennes and the Arapahoes owned that whole country, and with no right for a white man to pass across it at all. Did our emigrants to California ever meet with obstructions that amounted to anything from the Cheyennes and Arapahoes? Surely not. That thing lasted until 1861, when we made a treaty with these Indians, giving up the entire Territory of Colorado, all the rich mines of Colorado, and confining them to a very small reservation on the Arkansas river. In 1865 we asked them still further to go out of our way. Why? Because then we had concluded to build a railroad to California, and we insisted that they should go south of the Arkansas river, and we made a treaty with them which is now upon your statute-book. What was it? It proposed to give them a reservation, part of which was in Kansas, two thirds or three fourths of it in Kansas, and the rest of it belonged to other Indian tribes; but we said they should remain where they were on this small reservation on the north side of the Arkansas river until we secured the title to that country. When the treaty was under consideration a Senator from Kansas rose and moved an amendment. What was that? He said no part of the State of Kansas should be taken for this reservation except with the consent of the State of Kansas, and the President should find other quarters for these Indians. We have failed, so far, to procure the consent of the other Indian tribes owning the rest of the reservation, and it turns out that we have no home for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes at all, and now we propose to kill them. Why? Because they are standing in the way of a railroad to California. The Cheyennes and Arapahoes say, "Gentlemen, we have given you up the entire Territory of Colorado; we have given you up all our land there except a small reservation, and now you propose to build a railroad through it without our consent, and we tell you we intend to resist it." That is the whole case of the Cheyennes. General Sherman found them in the way, and they commenced their fight when we proposed to survey a line through there. General Sherman then said it was necessary to send them south of the Arkansas and to clean the line of these two roads; all the country between the Platte and the Arkansas, he said, must be cleaned of Indians, and if they remained there they must be looked upon as in hostility to the United States. We grumble and complain that the Cheyennes fight. I apprehend that if they were white men under these circumstances they would fight. I apprehend that if any of us here were in their situation we would fight. I am not justifying the Indians in their barbarity; but we, in the treaty, said they shall stay where they are until the President finds other quarters for them. He has been unable to do so; he has not got the consent of the State of Kansas to their being located in that State; and we have made no arrangements with the other Indian tribes who own a part of the reservation for purchasing out their title, and there is no place for these Indians to go.

Now, in regard to the Sioux Indians: in 1825 we made a treaty with them. That, I suppose, is superseded, and it is unnecessary for me now to refer to it. In 1851 the celebrated confederate treaty with all the Indian tribes there was made at Fort Laramie. The Sioux entered into that, the Cheyennes, the Assiniboinces, the Crows, and others. I have a map before me to which I could refer gentlemen if I desired to do so, but it is unnecessary. That map includes all the territory arranged by the treaty at Fort Laramie up to Montana Territory, and including Montana Territory. They divided out the country; the Cheyennes took their share of it, taking Colorado Territory, running away down to the mouth of the South Platte and down to the Arkansas river; and the Sioux took the country lying north of Fort Laramie, and what is called the Powder river country, where we have now built the forts, Reno, Phil. Kearney, and C. F. Smith. Under that treaty we got along very well, and lived in peace with the Sioux Indians. That treaty was made by General D. D. Mitchell, of St. Louis, and the Indians respected it, and we had no trouble from that time on.

The treaty of Fort Laramie acknowledged on our part their ownership of the entire country with our right to pass to California. We did not reserve any right to pass to Montana then, because the mines of Montana had not been discovered; but the mines of California had been discovered, and we required of the Sioux Indians, the Ogallallas, and the Brulés that we should have the right to pass over their country by the South Pass on the way to California, and that our emigrants should be undisturbed. From 1851, the date of that treaty, up to 1861, I believe I may defy anybody to refer to an outrage committed by these hostile Sioux of Fort Laramie upon any of the emigrants of our country. I do not remember such an occurrence; but I do remember the fact that emigrants from the south of Missouri passed out from year to year in parties of two, three, four, and five, and, in fact, solitary and alone to California, and I never heard any fear of Indian depredations expressed by anybody.

In that treaty of 1851 we acknowledged the entire right of the Sioux to the country they claimed, with the exception of a right reserved to our citizens to pass to California. We claimed no right to go to Montana then, because nobody supposed a white man would want to go to Montana. No mines had been discovered there; the riches of that country had not been developed. We did not suppose we should ever want the Powder river country. We were to give the Sioux $50,000 per annum for fifty years for this right to pass through their country to California. When the treaty came to the Senate, the Senate amended it, reducing the time to ten years, but leaving the amount at $50,000 per annum, with a right in the President to continue the payment for five years longer if he should see fit. We commenced paying $50,000 a year in 1851, and kept it up to 1861. Mr. Lincoln extended the time for five years under the amendment to the treaty, and continued the payment up to 1866. Up to that time we had scarcely any difficulty. Perhaps there may have been murders, as there are murders almost daily in the various States of the Union. Murders and outrages are committed in various sections of the country. Perhaps there are some bad Indians as well as bad white men. They did commit some depredations, but there was nothing like general war in that section of the country. In 1866, then, under the amendment to the treaty of 1851, the time expired, and now what is our condition with the Sioux Indians? General Pope at St. Louis issued an order in 1866, after the expiration of our treaty with these Indians. I do not mean to reflect on our military men, and I have the highest respect for General Pope; but I must call attention to this order. It was to establish three forts upon the Powder river route to Montana. Why? Because people wanted to go there and mine. He then went to work to establish the three forts called Fort Reno, Fort Phil. Kearney, and Fort C. F. Smith. He did that under military order, and there is our difficulty.

Mr. JOHNSON. What authority had he?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No authority in the world. I state frankly that he had no more authority than I had to establish a line of travel over the Sioux country, because if gentlemen will look back to the treaty of 1851 they will find that we pledge ourselves that there shall be no travel over that country except over the line of the South Pass on the way to California. It was not then supposed that we should ever want the Montana route; but when we find that that was the easiest and best route, and it became necessary for our purposes, we determined to go over it, and the military commander in order to facilitate emigration to that country ordered and built these three forts.

I hold in my hand the letter of the agent of these Indians to the Department here, saying that if we undertook to establish these forts we must fight the Sioux; they were unwilling to submit to it. But after that order was issued, and after the difficulty came to pass, General Pope issues his order and goes to work to build the forts, and after war ensued from it he writes a letter to which I wish to call attention. It is found on page 59 of a report which I hold in my hand, that was submitted by the Indian department last spring in answer to a resolution at that time. The report was called for when this war came upon us, as I undertake to say, principally through the orders of General Pope. He acted of course from the very best intentions. His idea was to give facility to emigrants and miners to cross this territory. Of course the order was demanded by the people of the State of Missouri. I do not doubt it; and nine tenths of the people of my State in all probability sympathize with General Pope in it. I perhaps stand almost alone. I know what the feeling is in the western States on this subject.

Mr. HOWARD. Were these forts in the Indian country?

Mr. HENDERSON. Clearly; as defined by the treaty of 1851, unquestionably so. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that the evidence is that the Indians said we might pass west of the mountains there instead of east, but that by going to the eastern side of the mountains, passing over the valleys of the Powder river, we should interfere with the only game that they had left; that they had no other country upon which the buffalo could feed and subsist there. If we would go to the west of the Big Horn mountains they would not object to our making a road up there, but they objected to the construction of a road and the building of forts on the eastern side of the mountains. They even said that they would not object to the building and garrisoning of the fort at Fort Reno, but further up than that they objected to our going, because there Powder river became a good large stream, and the bottoms upon it were large and the grass could grow. I understand that blue-grass grows there in large quantities. It is a good grazing country. They said that if we would turn off to the west and go to the west of the Big Horn mountains, through Fort Reno, we were welcome to march through their country there to that extent, but no further. That is some ninety miles north of the Platte river. Fort Phil. Kearney is, I understand, some two hundred miles north of the Platte river; and ninety miles further on is the Fort C. F. Smith on the route to Montana. Now, I wish to read a few words from General Pope's letter to General Grant after this war had broken out, clearly because in part, at least, of his order made without any regard to the rights of the Indians. He writes a letter urging that the Indian department be turned over to the military, and at the conclusion of it he says:

"A reference to my communications on this subject for the past twelve months will exhibit the fact that I have repeatedly warned the Government that the Indian war now upon us was inevitable, and that no reliance whatever could be placed upon treaties of peace such as had been negotiated. The peace commissioners promise the Indian, in the first place, that the whites shall not go into the Indian country, knowing well that it is impossible to fulfill such a promise."

We had made that promise in the treaty of 1851, but we simply recognized the existing rights of the Indians; that is, we pledged ourselves to protect them in all their rights, acknowledging their ownership of the country. General Pope says:

"It is impossible to fulfill any promise of the sort; the parties who make these treaties know they must be broken; and I have broken them, and I have known for twelve months that war would come out of it."

That is the whole of it.

"This is the first and most persistent demand of the Indian; a demand readily conceded, but never executed. Other provisions are inserted in the treaty equally certain to remain unfulfilled. The Indian has lost all confidence in such promises, and only makes a treaty to secure the money and supplies which accompany it. In this unscrupulous manner treaties are made."

I should like to know how he applies the word "unscrupulous" here. Does he mean unscrupulousness in making the promise or in breaking it?

"In this unscrupulous manner treaties are made and violated on both sides, and in this manner they will continue to be made unless some change in our Indian system is effected."

While the policy of the Government toward the Indian tribes is humane and liberal, so far as legal enactments are concerned, the mode of administering that policy has not only frustrated all the kind and benevolent intentions of the Government, but has absolutely worked wrong and injustice both to whites and Indians, which could not have occurred had there been no laws whatever on the subject."

That is, if we had no laws on the subject, we could get along very well, he says. I might stand here and read for any length of time, but I need not do so. When this war came, and the massacre of Fort Phil. Kearney occurred, General Sherman, of course, was exasperated by this conduct; and he sent a telegram here which the Indians have full knowledge of now, which I will read. I have the greatest respect for General Sherman, but this was a sad mistake on his part. No greater mistake could possibly have been committed. We undertook to construct forts in that country in which we had no right. Gentlemen may say that the savage must give way to civilization. Surely so; but then we ought to make the savage give way to civilization in such a manner as that we shall show a decent respect for ourselves and something like a regard for our own honor. Civilization ought to be civil. We have treaty stipulations with them, in which we say that they are entitled to a particular country; but we discover a gold mine beyond there, and then we break that treaty stipulation by having a military order to erect forts upon it to protect the settlers. Now we know, as a matter of fact, that not a mortal has traveled over that route to Montana for the last twelve months except a soldier; and scarcely a soldier has traveled over it since the Fort Phil. Kearney massacre. I know of not a single soldier who has traversed the Powder river country from the time of that massacre in December last down to the present time. It will not be done; and let me tell you that if fifty of these Indians can checkmate three thousand of our best cavalry it will be a long time before there will be any travel over it.

When this war came, instead of going back to the root of the evil, and correcting our wrongs to the Indians, General Sherman, feeling of course as any other man would feel, stung and nettled by these reverses of our arms, and by the fact that so many good men had been killed, and perhaps not understanding our treaty stipulations—in fact I know he did not—because in another letter he calls General Grant's attention to that, and asks him to see the Interior Department and have the matter examined so as to know exactly what are our rights, and what the rights of the Indians, and when ascertained that he desired to stand by the rights of the Indians—but nettled, as I say, on the 28th of December last he sent this telegram here, which has been communicated to the Sioux, and which they understand quite well:

ST. LOUIS, December 28, 1866.

GENERAL: Just arrived in time to attend the funeral of my adjutant general, Sawyer. I have given general instructions to General Cooke about the Sioux. I do not yet understand how the massacre of Colonel Fetterman's party could have been so complete. We must act with vindictive earnestness against the Sioux, even to their extermination, men, women, and children. Nothing else will reach the root of this case.

W. T. SHERMAN,
Lieutenant General.

U. S. GRANT.

You will find that in this war of extermination twenty-five of our own men will fall for every man, woman, or child of the Sioux. Mark what I tell you. General Sherman himself is now satisfied of it. But suppose we do exterminate them all; suppose that stung to the quick by these reverses and by this attempt of a barbarous band of people to wage war against the United States with all their fiendish malignity we go to war and kill them all, what does it amount to? Is it any honor to the people of the United States? What amount of credit do we gain by it? Is there any glory in a war of that sort? None whatever.

Then, sir, what is the proposition of the committee? I come to it at once, for I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate. We find a war waging and we want to get rid of it. We find no honor in waging such a war; we cannot see any laurels to be won; we cannot see anything except a blot upon our character as a people and upon the honor and good faith of the United States and a large accumulation of our public debt. That is all I can see in it. We might as well be honest, plain, blunt, and frank about this whole matter. We shall have thousands of our soldiers killed there, and all for glory. That is, an Indian has scalped somebody, and we must wage a perpetual war in order to avenge the wrong!

Mr. President, I am not here to justify the Indians. I am only here for the purpose of standing up to our own treaty obligations, and in my opinion when we do that we shall have less trouble with the Indians. We may have some trouble to be sure; but we shall have trouble with the negroes of the South, we shall have trouble with the white people of the South. Are not murders being committed in Texas? Certainly. Murders in North Carolina? Yes. Even in the fine old State of Massachusetts and in the very intelligent and great Empire State, New York, we find murders committed. Because a Sioux Indian commits a murder, because he steals a horse, (a light accomplishment that perhaps he has learned from the white man,) are you to wage war against an entire tribe? It will only inflict dishonor upon ourselves and accumulate our public debt.

Now, what is this proposition? It is to do something with these Indians; and what is that? To remove them off the line of these two railroads, the Platte road and the Smoky Hill road. We want to get them south of the Arkansas river and north of the Platte river, and bind them by treaty stipulations not to go upon the line of these roads. I do not propose even to close up the Powder river route, but to leave it open. The people of my State want it left open because it is the nearest and best route to Montana. I do not ask that it shall be closed, but I ask that a section of country be obtained for these Indians along the Missouri river, and that will enable us to furnish goods, annuities, &c., which we annually furnish to them under treaty stipulations, cheaper than in any other way. As it is now the Indians are scattered over an immense district of country. Here are the Crow Indians; they live west of the Big Horn mountain, far away west of the Powder river country, and we have to furnish them with annuities, and have to haul the goods out to them through these hostile regions. The boast of these Indians is that they have never yet killed a white man; that the blood of no white man is upon their skirts. They are peaceable, they are kind, they are pacific in all their intentions, and all their motives and desires.

They treat us with marked kindness, and they act as our friends in all our hostile operations against other tribes of Indians. We are annually to furnish them with provisions and annuities, and, if we possibly can do so, remove them within narrower boundaries. If we intend that the military shall operate against the Indians in time to come, let us put them in stated reservations, where forts can be built around them, so that so large a force will not be required to take care of them and watch them. Our proposition is to take the various Indians that are out in that section of country and bring them to a "district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska, west of the Missouri river, and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory." That will leave the Powder river route entirely in our possession. I may be asked if I propose to select an immense district of country lying on the borders of the Little Missouri, the Yellowstone, the White Earth, and the Cheyenne rivers and leave it to the Indians for all time to come. I answer that I would do so for the present. We have got to do something with the Indians, and, the way the matter now stands, perhaps another thousand millions of debt will be added to our present heavy burden in that shape in order to exterminate them. They are now upon the lines of travel, and we have got to select some country to put them upon.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator be good enough to state about what quantity of territory he proposes to turn over to the Indians for their occupancy, north of Nebraska?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not suppose the Senator can form any definite idea on that subject; but he will see at once that is a very important item for our consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator that my information is that this country is worth very little, and that it is not likely that it will be settled up within the next hundred years. It includes what is called the mauvais terre country, the poor land country of the Missouri river. With the exception of small or narrow valleys upon these several rivers that I have named, and some other smaller streams, there is no arable or tillable land at all. It is a section of country that the white man in all probability will not need during the present generation, or perhaps the one to come.

Mr. HOWARD. How is it as to hunting grounds?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the buffalo, the elk, and the deer do live in large quantities upon these river bottoms, and that in all probability the Indian may by a proper system of tillage be enabled to support himself; but I will state to the Senator those valleys are very narrow. I do not pretend to say that the Indians can live there. There is some doubt about it. But we desire to leave this discretionary with this commission upon an examination. My friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] offers now to amend the bill so as to require of them first to examine it, I suppose with that view, and afterward to make the selection; but in the bill now before the Senate it will be observed that it is to be left upon their report to the confirmation of the two Houses of Congress. It will not become a permanent selection for the Indians until we ratify it, and I suppose it will be the duty of these gentlemen to report all the facts they can gather in reference to it.

If this thing is done, in the course of a few years we can get the entire body of Indians of the Northwest off from the lines of travel, the Pacific railway, the Powder river route, and various other routes of travel, and can confine them upon this district of country where they can be supplied more cheaply than in any other district of country that I know of with their goods; and if it be necessary hereafter to use the military, they will be confined within narrower bounds, where it will not require three thousand of our best cavalry to check-mate fifty wild Indians.

It will be impossible to put all the Indian tribes there. I do not know whether we can put the tribes that I have named there. That will be a matter for subsequent adjudication by Congress upon the report of all the facts that can be gathered. The committee propose in the third section to select another district of country in the present Indian Territory, or adjoining to it. I would take in also perhaps a part or the eastern portion of New Mexico. That would be my idea; and if they can make any negotiation with the State of Texas, to take what are called the Staked Plains of Texas. There is a large district of country there that might be very profitably used by the Indians, and which perhaps cannot be used by the white man for a century to come. I did not wish to insert anything of that sort, because that would involve a serious difficulty perhaps with Texas; but the commissioners can see whether they can make any arrangements with the State of Texas by which to get a portion of that section of country.

Upon this southern reservation we propose to gather all of the southern tribes of Indians named in the third section; and in that way we shall clear out the line of travel on the Smoky Hill route to California, and also on the line of travel to Santa Fé.

The fourth section provides that the commissioners, with a view to the concentration of the Indians in these two reservations, may make treaties with other tribes than the hostile Indians. No treaty will be final upon us until it is submitted to the Senate and ratified. We can determine whether it is advisable to do so or not; and I apprehend, with all the facts before us, and a report such as these commissioners can make to us, that we shall have no trouble whatever in coming to correct conclusions.

The fifth section is an appropriation of money; first, "to carry out the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, $150,000." It will be seen that this is less than one day's cost of the present war. If these military men in conjunction with these eminent civilians can do anything toward stopping this war for $150,000, why, in the name of sense, let us try it. One day of the war will cost it all, and then, if we can make peace, remember that we have rid ourselves of the most brilliant prospect for a three or four years' war that we have had since the beginning of the recent rebellion, because this is much more important and much greater in its proportions than any Senator, perhaps, here to-day imagines.

The fifth section further appropriates as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to subside such friendly Indians as may have separated or may hereafter separate themselves from the hostile bands or tribes and seek the protection of the United States, $300,000."

I will read from the very able report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the other day in reference to this matter. I do not come up to his estimates at all, because I propose to provide simply for the period of time between this and the next meeting of Congress. He proposes an appropriation for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June next. I will read to the Senate an extract from his report, which will show the necessity of this last provision. He says:

"There are now on the Niobrara river, near the Platte river, about fifteen hundred friendly Sioux, who have separated from the hostile bands. To this number will soon be added some two thousand or two thousand five hundred friendly Indians, now on their way from the hostile country."

These are the Sioux Indians. Some of them come in and give themselves up, and when they do they are turned over to the Interior Department by the military, all of which is perfectly right. It is impossible for the military to subsist in a proper manner their own troops, much less to subsist these Indian captives, where they have large numbers of them. Many of the bands of the Sioux have come in and said, "We are not waging war against the United States; we have nothing to do with these Brulé and Ogallalla bands; we are friendly; we are not hostile; we wage no war against the United States; but if we remain among our own people they force us into the ranks." They have surrendered themselves, and they have to be taken care of. At this season of the year they cannot raise a crop; in fact they have no means; they have no country upon which to do it, and they have to be taken care of by the United States just as prisoners of war are; we have to feed them. It is a necessity. It is upon us. The Commissioner says:

"To this number will soon be added some two thousand or twenty-five hundred friendly Indians, now on their way from the hostile country. Pending hostilities, or until placed on reservations, and until they shall have raised a crop or two, these Indians will have to be subsisted by the Government, or permitted to join their hostile kindred. To give them three-quarter rations will cost $300,000; and it is recommended that this sum be appropriated by Congress at the present session for their subsistence for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865."

In regard to the Cheyennes he says:

"The friendly Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Apaches of the south, forced by General Hancock's command to abandon their hunting grounds, set apart to them by the treaty of October, 1865, are now at or near Fort Cobb, in the Indian Territory, in a destitute condition, and number, it is believed, from five to seven thousand souls. These Indians, if not permitted to return to their own hunting grounds, must either be fed by the Government or be driven to plundering the border inhabitants and war. An appropriation is therefore asked of $500,000 for the purpose of supplying these Indians if found to be necessary."

Instead of appropriating $800,000, as asked by the Commissioner—and I think the Commissioner has overestimated the number who segregated themselves from the Arapahoes and Cheyennes—we propose merely to provide from this time until the next meeting of Congress, and give him, instead of $800,000, the sum of $300,000 for this subsistence.

Mr. President, that is the bill. It is all of it. It is an honest effort, as we conceive, on the part of the committee to get rid of this Indian war, a war that gives us no character at home or abroad; one that involves us in calamities and miseries; one that will cause the death of many of our soldiers; one which has already caused the desertion of numbers from the service, because it is the hardest service soldiers ever did, and which, in the end, must saddle us with large, increased debt. We are not particular about the shape of the bill at all. We only desire that some earnest effort be made on the part of civilians and of our military men who have been engaged in this war, and who understand perhaps by this time the Indian character, to do something toward that State of peace which existed from 1851 up to 1865.

Now, in regard to the names of the commission, this is a suggestion of my own; the committee is not involved in this at all, because the committee did not consult in regard to the names. I am willing that any name be stricken from the list and others be added. I have selected General Sherman. I think he ought to be upon the commission. I have selected Major General Hancock. He has been implicated; there have been charges against him that he unnecessarily and wantonly burned the Cheyenne village. I do not want to leave General Hancock off this commission. Let him be upon the commission, and if he has reasons for his conduct, let him there state them; let the commission be notified, have all the facts before them, and not have it a one-sided affair.

I do not want all civilians. I want the military represented upon it; and if we have got to fight it out, no man will more cheerfully give the means, the money, and the men in order to put it down. If nothing else but extermination will do, we cannot permit the Indian to stand in the way of civilization, and his termination must come. But I desire to try everything before I come to that, to see if it is possible to settle this unfortunate difficulty of races. It seems that we are afflicted more than any people on earth with this matter of races. We had the negro question that convulsed this country from 1820 up to 1861, and then the bloodiest war known, the greatest war known in the annals of time, over the question of race, the black race. Now we have scarcely got through that when, it seems, we must have another war over the red man. If we can settle this question peaceably and amicably we ought to do so. My idea is to civilize the Indian. Let him fall back into civilization instead of pressing him out of it. I think wherever we can make citizens of the Indians it ought to be done. They ought to be mixed up with the whites as far as possible in order to prevent complaint, and in order to save our own credit and our own honor.

Then I propose to take General Hancock. I know him. There is no better man. I need not say a word in favor of General Augur. He is known perhaps to every member of this Senate; a man of eminent ability, a very distinguished officer, and one who will make a good commissioner. Then I take General John E. Smith. He is now in command at Fort Phil. Kearney. Then I take General William S. Harney, the man who above all others waged a successful war against the Indians; in fact, the only man up to the present day who has ever successfully waged war against them. Then I take General John B. Sanborn, who is known to every member of the Senate perhaps. He was a distinguished officer in our late war. He is now a civilian, a good man, a man of eminent abilities, moral, upright, discreet. I take also William Bent, who is known to every man who knows anything about the Indians, a man who has been among them for an age almost, now an aged man living in the city of St. Louis, who has traded with them, been among them, and dealt with them. I take also G. P. Beauvais. He is an Indian trader. The reason why I put him on the commission is that he speaks fluently and well all the dialects of the Sioux tribes. He can go among them, has influence with them, is known to all their chiefs and head men, and in all probability will do more to secure peace with them than any other man we can name. Then I take Kit Carson. It is unnecessary to say anything in favor of Kit Carson. He is a man eminently qualified for a commission of this sort.

Now, Mr. President, with this commission I think we can bring about a peace; and by adding simply the name of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I think we ought to do, it is, in my judgment, as good a commission as we can obtain. The general purposes of the bill are such as eminently commend themselves to my mind, and ought to commend themselves, I think, to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope not.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 8, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is a quorum present. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope my friend from Michigan will withdraw his motion, and let us act on this bill. I understand that the message of the President will come in to-morrow or the next day, and whatever we are going to do on this subject we had better do at once.

Mr. HOWARD. I would do so out of courtesy to my friend—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The yeas and nays having been ordered, the call can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. But the bill is of so much importance that I want sometime to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, the call is withdrawn.

Mr. HARLAN. I am gratified with the general tenor of the bill. There are some amendments that I will suggest, if they shall not be previously suggested by members of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to ask what was the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn?

Mr. HARLAN. You withdrew the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the call to be withdrawn.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I did not call for the yeas and nays myself. Some other gentleman called for them; and I am sure the division showed there was no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then upon the motion to adjourn the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Ramsey, Thayer, Van Winkle, and Willey—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Cragin, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, and Williams—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARLAN. The first difficulty which I suggest on noticing this bill may not be real, and yet I will venture to call the attention of the committee to it—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will allow me to remind him that the question now is on my amendment to strike out the words "make selection of" in the second line of the second section, and to insert the word "examine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Maine; after which the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be in order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move further to amend the same section, section two, by inserting after the word "labor" in the eleventh line the words, "and if found suited to that purpose to select and describe the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. While the Senator is engaged in amending that second section with regard to the boundaries, I should like to make a suggestion which probably he will accept, and thus dispose of it. For instance, in the third line of the second section I would strike out the words "north of the State of Nebraska." Then, again, I suggest to him to have stricken out, after the word "river" in the fourth line, the words, "and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, the Little Missouri, and Yellowstone rivers," so that the section would read: "That said commissioners are required to examine a district of country lying west of the Missouri river, of sufficient area," and so on, not being more particular in the designation of the country than that, giving them the whole country west of Missouri river to select from. At present they are restricted to the country north of Nebraska and south of Kansas, and giving them the choice as far north as the mouth of the Yellowstone; thus, if they are so disposed, erecting a barrier of wild Indians against all access east and west, north of Nebraska. I presume that is not the purpose of the chairman of the committee; but it seems to me very strange that he should leave a wide belt there of four hundred miles west of Kansas in which not an Indian hereafter is to be located, and spread all those Indians north of Nebraska as far up as the mouth of the Yellowstone, thus effectually excluding travel east and west on this continent north of Nebraska. That certainly cannot be the purpose of the committee, or of its chairman; and yet the language of the section would lead to that conclusion, unless the amendment that I suggest be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose the idea was that they should have ample territory to examine, and when selected and described, it is to be reported to Congress for its adoption. But the chairman of the committee has special charge of this bill, and therefore I refer the matter to him.

Mr. RAMSEY. But why, at this early stage, express a preference for such a result as I have indicated?

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to my friend from Minnesota that we cannot select Indian reservations in the State of Nebraska without the consent of that State, and I suppose the Senators from that State would very seriously object to such a proposition.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to your going north of Nebraska, if you please, but why go as far as the international boundary and cover that entire region of country and erect a barrier to all the travel that passes through there now?

Mr. HENDERSON. It does not contemplate anything of that sort.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is within the power of the commissioners under this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no.

Mr. RAMSEY. "That said commissioners are required to make selection of a district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska, west of the Missouri river, and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As amended, they are required to examine that district.

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And then it comes back to us.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why should they in their examination and recommendation confine themselves to this district of country? There are only about thirty-five or forty thousand Indians to provide for. Why put it into the power of the commission to locate them all over that country?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill does not do so. If my honorable friend will examine it, he will find that it is not obnoxious to that criticism.

Mr. RAMSEY. Of course it is, though you have modified it somewhat.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to offer my amendments. I move further to amend the same section, section two, by striking out all after the word "thereon" in the thirteenth line, in the following words:

And no person not connected with said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested.

And inserting in lieu thereof:

Secured to said Indians, subject only to the jurisdiction of the United States.

So that the clause will read:

Said territory when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain a permanent home for the Indians located thereon, secured to said Indians subject only to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. I have a doubt about the propriety of that amendment, unless the Senator intends to amend further. I suppose the object in adopting this phraseology was to prevent white persons intruding on the reservations to be selected. We all know that there is a class of trappers and hunters hovering on the frontiers that are not much better than Indians, and not so good as some of them, and they intrude themselves on the Indian territories and commit depredations which generally lead to the wars that cost the Government so much, and frequently cost the loss of so many lives. I think it better to preserve what has been the policy heretofore of the Government on that subject, and exclude intrusion of this kind of white persons on the reservations donated or set apart to the Indians.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This section contemplates the action of Congress upon the report of the commissioners, and the object of this amendment is, in the first place, to avoid the implication of the language now that when this territory is selected, no white man shall ever set his foot on it except by the consent of the Indians. That, I think, is too strong. That would seem to oust the jurisdiction of the United States and put it absolutely within the control of the Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. The usual phraseology is "except employes of the Government and those authorized by the Government to enter the territory."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Instead of that I propose to strengthen the idea in this section that the title which the Indians shall have in it shall be secured to them as property by suitable provisions of Congress; that whatever territory this commission shall set out, and to which these Indians are removed, they shall be entitled to remain there as their home, and they shall be secured in it. I wish to make that idea prominent, and it is not, as the bill now stands. Then I wish to avoid the implication that it shall be set up there as an absolute barrier to our travel over it, and therefore, while I secure their rights, I subject their rights to the absolute jurisdiction of the United States; so that the Government of the United States may hold their rights as they hold the rights of the citizens of the United States, and grant privileges in regard to this territory by right of way, or anything else, as it may deem proper, subject to the personal rights of these parties.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the honorable gentleman from Maine contemplate establishing a Territory north of Nebraska, in that region of country, so large as to accommodate all the tribes lying in that region, and that that Territory is to remain inaccessible to settlers for any considerable period of time? Does he contemplate that the title of this Indian Territory thus to be selected shall remain in the Indians, and that the lands shall not be purchasable by settlers? Is this the policy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir, without their consent, precisely following the example in the case of the Cherokees and Chickasaws.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg, then, for one, in limine, to raise my feeble voice against any such policy as that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope it will turn out to be very feeble. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Feeble as it is it will be used in opposition to that policy. I believe it to be the most mischievous policy that ever has been adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I meet that question precisely here, and say to the honorable Senator that I propose, when these Indians are removed to such territory as this commission shall say is suited to them, suited to their improvement and civilization, that it shall be theirs, for them and their posterity forever, against settlers and everybody else, without their consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the honorable Senator, if that is the case, why does he not end the matter by enforcing the existing treaties. By the existing treaties and laws of the United States the Cheyennes and the Sioux have a right to the soil upon which we are now building two railroads. You complain about military officers and other persons violating the law, and yet Congress itself has violated the law over and over again. It has by law authorized companies to enter upon this land and locate railroads. It has located roads and authorized the construction of roads over these lands; to be traveled in violation of the treaties. If we are simply to make treaties there are treaties enough if you will enforce them: if you violate them you will violate this treaty.

Mr. HOWARD. And this very selection, if the Senator will allow me one word, they extend so far to the north as to terminate with the divisional boundary line of the United States on the north, and it may embrace the very route over which the Northern Pacific railroad is about to be laid out.

Mr. RAMSEY. We have already made a grant of lands for it.

Mr. HOWARD. We have already made a grant of land to that railroad, a very large grant; and it cannot be denied, it seems to me, that this policy will lead directly to a defeat of perhaps all the objects embraced in the original charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Why pile up the Indians to the injury of that company and for the benefit of other companies? Why huddle them together in that particular region?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend would give this subject a little careful attention and hear what the committee have to say, I am inclined to think most of the difficulties he raises here would fall. There is not the slightest apprehension of any such thing as he suggests. The difficulty of the honorable Senator is that he does not want to have the thing explained. In the first place, the limits of the bill do not reach anywhere near the region of country he supposes; and, in the second place, by its terms it only proposes an examination. It does not invest the commission with the slightest power to locate, but simply to examine that region of country to see if it is suitable for the residence of these Indians, and if they find it to be so in their judgment, they are to indicate it and describe it particularly, so that Congress can exercise its judgment, whether it interferes with any existing rights, or whether, on that report, it is consistent with the present condition of the country and its future growth, its future prosperity, its future development, that they should be located in that particular place.

Now, not to accept a proposition of that kind is to say that you are not willing to agree that the Indian shall have an abiding place on this continent anywhere; that he is to be bargained with to-day and faith broken with him to-morrow, as in all the past; that there is no place where you are willing to put down your foot and say, "There; if you will accept that, you shall have the guarantee of the Government that you shall be secure in it." If I understand the theory of the honorable Senator from Michigan, when the committee propose to locate the Indian here permanently and define his rights and give him a right in the soil, it is that he is not willing that the nation shall pledge its faith that the Indian shall have a permanent abiding place anywhere.

Now, sir, we have come to this point in the history of the country, that there is no place beyond population to which you can remove the Indian. It has been so in the past. As population has approached the Indian we have removed him beyond population. But population now encounters him on both sides of the continent, and there is no place on the continent to which he can be removed beyond the progress of population. That is the point now; and the precise question is, will you exterminate him, or will you fix an abiding place for him? That is what you have got to do; fight him, make war on him to his extinction, or treat with him, define in your own judgment, having a proper regard for his rights as a human being, say arbitrarily—I agree to that—that he shall be where the necessities of civilization require him to take his place; and when he has taken it, give him the guarantees of security. That is all we ask. That is precisely the character of this measure.

Now, I say that we authorize this commission, first, to examine a much larger tract of country than we suppose they would think of locating the Indian upon; to examine and see if they can find in this whole region of country a tract suitable for this location. Of course they will take into consideration the question to which the Senator from Michigan alludes; that is, the question whether it comes within the limits of heretofore granted rights either to the Northern Pacific or the Southern Pacific railroad, or anybody else. But we say to the commission, "Locate it somewhere, if you can—in some area in the north which shall be suited to the wants of the Indian, and report it to Congress." If, upon that report, it shall be found to be consistent with the rights of the United States, to be compatible with its interests, then I submit we ought to say to the Indian, "If you will take your place there on the continent it shall be secured to you against the rights of the settlers." But I would subject it to the jurisdiction of the United States, for I hold that we ought to extend our jurisdiction and our laws over these tribes, and it should not depend upon the conditions of a treaty whether the citizens of the United States shall pass over the territory they inhabit, or whether the United States shall charter railroad corporations or anything of that sort.

Mr. RAMSEY. Has the Senator fixed his boundaries? Is he through with his amendments to this second section?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEY. Has the Senate voted upon all those amendments?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move a further amendment, to insert after the word "rivers," in the sixth line the words "south of the forty-fourth degree of north latitude."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be in order after the amendment now pending is disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I thought it had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No vote has been taken upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I beg pardon; I thought it was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, in section two, line thirteen, after the word "thereon" to strike out the words "and no person not connected with said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested," and to insert "secured to said Indians subject only to the jurisdiction of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend this second section by striking out in the third line the words "north of the State of Nebraska," and in lines four, five, and six, by striking out the words "and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, the Little Missouri, and the Yellowstone rivers;" so as to leave all the country west of the Missouri river and north of the line of Nebraska open to the selection of this commission. They have but to provide for about thirty-five or forty thousand Indians, and I am sure they can get a passable country in all that large district, country that is in some degree agricultural, as much so as the Indians require at least, without giving the commission the privilege of settling these Indians all through that country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to hear the amendment read. I do not understand it.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section two, line three, to strike out the words "north of the State of Nebraska," and in lines four, five, and six to strike out the words "and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, the Little Missouri, and the Yellowstone rivers;" so that the section will read:

That said commissioners are required to examine a district of country lying west of the Missouri river of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes, &c.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to know the object of the amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the general scope and purpose of this bill. I approve of it. I approve of selecting reservations and locating the Indians upon them; but certainly from this debate it must be clear to the Senate that there has been no very thorough examination of the districts of country named in this bill. The matter does not seem to be very well understood, and has not been well considered. Hence I think it is wrong at this stage of the business to hamper and confine this commission to the designation of localities for these reservations; we should leave that whole matter to their judgment. The purpose of the committee seems to be to provide for the Indians a reservation north of the Central Pacific railroad and west of the Missouri river. Then why follow that up with any more particular designations in the absence of more full information than the committee seem to have about it?

The Senator from Maine, in his liberality and generosity to the Indians, after they have been driven out fifteen hundred miles to the West and despoiled of their country, seems disposed, and the chairman of the committee seems disposed, to locate them forever, and give them a title that shall hereafter be considered sacred beyond all Indian titles, upon the poorest lands, as they describe them themselves, that they can find upon the continent; the bad lands west of the Missouri and the Staked Plains down in northern Texas. That is very liberal and very generous, is it not? But, after all, from what we have learned in this debate, I think the largest range should be left to this commission, that they may select throughout all the country west of the Missouri river.

There are but thirty-five thousand Indians to provide for. There are the hostile Sioux, the Teton Sioux; there are fifteen thousand of them, and they are not all hostile. Then there are some of the northern Cheyennes and the Arapahoes; and assuming that you intend to provide for the Indians north of this line not hostile, there are the Crows, about ten thousand, and the Blackfeet, about seven thousand; and that is all that you have to provide for—not over about thirty-five thousand Indians.

Mr. HENDERSON. How many Sioux?

Mr. RAMSEY. About fifteen thousand Teton Sioux.

Mr. HENDERSON. But they are not all the entire band of Sioux up there. The object is to take all.

Mr. RAMSEY. They are all the Dakotas that are hostile. The Sissetons and Wahpetons are provided for by a treaty which you ratified at the last session of Congress. The Medawakantons and the Waupakootas are down on a reservation near the mouth of the Niobrara, and the Yanctons have a reservation down below Fort Randall; they are few in number. The hostile Sioux are entirely Teton, and they number about fifteen thousand. There are only about thirty-five thousand Indians in all to be provided for.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not at all particular about this matter. I suppose the Senator, from the intimation he has made, is under the impression that the committee are attempting to block up the way of the Northern Pacific railroad. I can assure the Senator from Minnesota that an idea of that sort never entered my mind.

Mr. RAMSEY. I distinctly said that I did not think that was the purpose, but it looked like it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That may be the case; but I did not think of the railroad in drafting the bill; and now I can state to the Senator that according to my recollection of the charter of that road, the bill as it stands will throw his road north of the reservation proposed. If the Senator is of the impression that it does not, let him strike out the words "and Yellowstone," and that surely will confine the reservation entirely south of the proposed line of the North Pacific railroad. If there is any Senator here who is favorable to a measure of that sort, I suppose that I am. I have never been inimical to it. I desire to see it constructed. I do not wish to put any obstacle in the way of its construction.

I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that the people of my State will make objection, just as he now does, to having an Indian reservation down in the Indian Territory; and bringing other tribes there. They are very anxious to get rid of the tribes that are there now. The Indian Territory is west of my State, and they are all the time talking of the blocking up of civilization to the west of my State. We cannot put these Indians anywhere without having a squabble with Senators about their location. The Senator from Minnesota is not singular in this matter. The people of the West all complain when you begin to put Indians in their neighborhood. Now the Senator is complaining—not that Minnesota is to be troubled, because I believe Minnesota has got rid of her Indians very well. He says I now propose to put them on the poorest land in the world. I believe my friend from Minnesota has driven the Indians from place to place, putting them upon poorer and poorer lands and smaller reservations, until now I think the Chippewas and others are living upon fish entirely; on large reservations covering lakes only—no lands, but all lakes. [Laughter.] I think that was one of the difficulties last winter.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is the diet they prefer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. He says I propose now to put them on the mauvais terre, the bad lands of the Missouri river. There are some good lands there, I believe, on almost all the rivers, where I suppose they could sustain themselves. I do not wish to put them anywhere unless this commission say they can sustain themselves there.

But my friend ought not to say, that pretending to be friendly to the Indian—I am no more friendly to him than he ought to be—I am now providing a way and means for starving him to death. Not by any means. I select a commission of able and distinguished men, and direct that they go and seek a reservation for these Indians, and try and save them, if it can possibly be done. Otherwise let us at least get them upon reservations where we can kill them without so much expenditure as it now costs us. Let us get them upon smaller reservations where it will not cost so much to kill them. It costs us now $1,000,000 to kill an Indian, and the Senator knows it. If he wants extermination, let him join with me and get them on a small reservation, where a regiment of men can do the work. It will be an easy matter to kill them then, with forts all around them; but now it is exceedingly difficult. Therefore, even upon the hypothesis of some Senators who want extermination, I think it would be infinitely better to get the Indians on small reservations where they can be exterminated without great cost.

But, sir, I rose with reference to what the Senator said in regard to my desire to block up the North Pacific railroad. I do not desire to do it. If he will strike out the words "and Yellowstone" he will then accomplish his object; because surely his line of road cannot go south of the Yellowstone. He knows that, and that will leave this Indian reservation south of the Yellowstone river. That will accomplish all he wants.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will accept that amendment with the further modification, which I presume the Senator will agree to, "and south of the forty-fourth degree of north latitude."

Mr. HENDERSON. I would not do that, because it may be necessary to go a little north of that; but surely the Senator does not desire to build that road on any stream north of the Yellowstone river.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator knows that the Northern Pacific railroad is permitted to go as far south as the forty-fifth degree of north latitude.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then say the forty-fifth degree of north latitude.

Mr. RAMSEY. Your disposition is to keep the Indians from the lines of railway, I suppose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose these gentlemen ought to have some discretion and some sense. There are gentlemen on the commission who are interested in the road, or if not, let the Senator name some one who will have an eye to the interests of the Northern Pacific railroad. I am not particular about the man.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am willing to accept the forty-fifth degree of north latitude.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let them have a discretion between those lines.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I will only move to strike out the words "and Yellowstone" and add the words "south of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.
